A large measure of credit for this remarkable achievement generally has been given to the C. A. A. and the Air Safety Board. Yet the President is proposing not only to return supervisory control over civil aviation to a bureau in the Commerce Department but to abolish the Safety Board altogether, thereby reuniting the judicial and administrative functions.

Once before Mr. Roosevelt intervened to alter the Government's relations with the air-transport lines. That was in 1934, when he abruptly ordered the cancelation of all existing air-mail contracts. For a period of slightly less than 3 months, on the President's instructions, the United States Army flew the mails. In the process 66 planes crashed and 12 pilots were killed. New contracts were then quickly signed with the private companies. Before Mr. Roosevelt puts into effect his Reorganization Plan No. IV, over the protest of virtually all persons informed in aviation matters, he might do well to recall what happened the other time he elected to disregard expert advice.

PROTECTION OF CERTAIN FOREIGN PROPERTY WITHIN THE UNITED STATES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 252) to amend section 5 (b) of the act of October 6, 1917, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. DANAHER obtained the floor.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I should like an opportunity to offer an amendment to the pending joint resolution before the Senator begins, if he will yield to me for that purpose. I do not propose to address the Senate upon the merits of the proposition, as I did that the other day, and I do not care to repeat. Is it agreeable to the Senator that I will now offer the amendment? It does not relate to the amendment which the Senator from Connecticut desires to offer.

Mr. DANAHER. No; but, I take it that it is an amendment that has been suggested by our conferences.

Mr. WAGNER. The amendment I intend to offer was suggested by me to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], frankly because the Senator from California still has some apprehension as to the effect of the joint resolution. I do not believe that the so-called Johnson Act can in any way, either directly or indirectly, be affected by the pending joint resolution, but I was a Member of the Senate when the Senator brought forth his bill which became the law, and was one of his followers at that time. I do not want to do anything which will, in any way, create any apprehension in the Senator's mind, or in the minds of other Senators who have raised the question, that this joint resolution in any way affects the so-called Johnson Act or the Neutrality Act. I am simply offering an amendment to make that perfectly clear, and I thought perhaps the Senator would like to have that known before he begins to discuss his amendment.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, there has been general apprehension that, because of this joint resolution coming after the Neutrality Act by which credit restrictions were set up, it might be claimed at some time or other that those restrictions had been modified by the joint resolution. If the Senator from New York wants to make certain that there is no question of that, and that there is no question of an inveighment against the provisions of the Johnson Act, I am more than happy to yield to him for the purpose of offering the amendment required by that situation.

Mr. WAGNER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. Do I understand correctly that the Senator proposes to modify the joint resolution?

Mr. WAGNER. I propose to modify it to an extent which will make it so clear that there will be no contentious point about it, that the joint resolution does not in any way affect the Johnson Act or the Neutrality Act.

Mr. McNARY. Very well, I am in accord with that view, and I suggest to the Senator that he permit his amendment to be stated at the desk now so that it may be before the Senate.

Mr. WAGNER. I thank the Senator and I now offer the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to amend the joint resolution by adding at the end thereof a new section to read as follows:

SEC. 3. Nothing in this joint resolution shall be deemed to repeal or to modify in any manner any of the provisions of the act of April 13, 1934 (48 Stat. 574) (the Johnson Act), or of the Neutrality Act of 1939 (Public Res. 54, 76th Cong.).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendment? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I am very happy that the amendment submitted by the senior Senator from New York has been adopted. Senators will recall that on Thursday last, when Senate Joint Resolution 252 was submitted, it was explained that its general as well as immediate purpose was to prevent any possible gain to Germany by virtue of her invasion of Norway and Denmark. Indeed, the Senator from New York at that time told us—

I do not even know what may happen overnight, because word has undoubtedly reached there that we are proposing to amend the existing law. The transfers of credits and securities may be accomplished very quickly by cable or radio message. If the construction that has been placed upon the law by some bank in New York is correct, the transfer will have to be made to the invader, who will secure that property. That is why I do not think we ought to waste a moment's time, and I know the Senate does not desire to waste a moment, in an emergency matter of this kind.

There was at that time in the minds of a good many of us an apprehension that if the joint resolution were passed under the aegis of the emergency and the need for haste as then claimed for it, there might result a modification of the Johnson Act, and there might be, by intendment at least, a limitation or modification of the credit restrictions imposed by the Neutrality Act. One of the purposes in the minds of many of us was to seek to clarify the joint resolution and, therefore, to give it more study. Consequently, a most salutary result has been accomplished this morning in amending the joint resolution to the extent just agreed upon by the Senate. But, Mr. President, if the joint resolution, upon more mature thought, required the amendment which has just been adopted, let me submit to the Senate that there are yet other amendments which ought to be considered, and in the light of maturity of deliberation and more-considered judgment, I submit that the Senate will find that there is ample room for additional amendments.

I think, Mr. President, that I should first call attention to the fact that this particular joint resolution would amend the old Trading With the Enemy Act, which was adopted in 1917, when the United States was at war. In section 5 (a) of that act we read this:

That the President, if he shall find it compatible with the safety of the United States and with the successful prosecution of the war, may, by proclamation, suspend the provisions of this act so far as they apply to an ally of enemy, and he may revoke or renew such suspension from time to time.

In section 5 (b) we read:

That the President may investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange, export, or earmarkings of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, transfers of credit in any form—

Notice, Mr. President, that even in time of war we specifically interpolated into that act this language—

(other than credits relating solely to transactions to be executed wholly within the United States).

That parenthetical exception as contained in the 1917 act was omitted in 1933 when the 1917 act was further amended, and it is not found in the pending joint resolution. Consequently, we very definitely have the President of the United States being given in time of peace a power which even in time of war we denied to the President of the United States. I continue to read from section 5 (b):

And transfers of evidences of indebtedness or of the ownership of property between the United States and any foreign country, whether enemy, ally of enemy or otherwise, or between residents of one or more foreign countries, by any person within the United States.

Mr. President, you will notice that there was not then required an interest of a foreign government in the property; there was not then required anything like the degree of ownership that is implied as necessary to submit the particular evidence of indebtedness, such as a bond, or evidence of ownership of property, such as stock, to regulation and control, and, in fact, prohibition; and there was not then given to the President the power to limit all such transactions as is contemplated by the pending joint resolution.

So, when in 1933, we had the bank holiday when there was need that there be some protection given to the banking institutions of the United States, there was not then, as someone would have us think, an all-embracing restriction. That is made perfectly clear by a comparison of the language which appears in Forty-sixth Statutes at Large on page 1, section 2, of the act then passed, which was entitled "An act to provide relief in the existing national emergency in banking, and for other purposes."

In that section there was very definitely omitted language which would constitute a restriction upon the transfer of credits, and an exemption of transactions wholly for execution within the United States.

Moreover, there was then omitted provision as to evidences of indebtedness or evidences of ownership of property. Consequently, it cannot be said that those who wrote that legislation, knowing very well the full intendment of the language, and what they were seeking to do, had any thought then that the President of the United States should be given the power in time of peace to control by regulation or by prohibition transactions involving evidences of indebtedness or evidences of ownership of property.

Mr. President, the pending joint resolution goes further than anything that has ever been granted by way of power to the President in time of peace in any such fashion as is here contemplated. Not only does the joint resolution inveigh against transactions involving, and transfers of credit between banks in this country, but, under the power of regulation which some purport to find in the existing law, we see that on the 10th of April 1940 the President, by proclamation, actually added section 9 to the regulations issued in 1934, which appear in the committee report, forbidding such transactions if they involved property in which Norway or Denmark had an interest.

Mr. President, let me ask at this time unanimous consent that the committee report be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report (No. 1496) is as follows:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 252) to amend section 5 (b) of the act of October 6, 1917, as amended, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment and recommend that the joint resolution do pass.

The provisions of the resolution were recommended to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The purpose of the resolution is to remove any doubt that section 5 (b) of the act of October 6, 1917, as amended, authorizes the President to regulate transactions in evidences of indebtedness and evidences of ownership of property in which foreigners have an interest, and to require reports concerning all foreign-owned property.

The resolution is made necessary by certain questions which have arisen in connection with the Executive order of April 10, 1940, and regulations issued thereunder by the Secretary of the Treasury. The order and regulations were issued pursuant to the authority conferred by section 5 (b) of the act of October 6, 1917, as finally amended by section 2 of the act of March 9, 1933. The order and regulations have imposed certain restrictions on transactions in property in which Norway and Denmark or nationals thereof have an interest and have set up a system of licensing transactions in such property.

The Treasury Department has ruled that the order and regulations of April 10, 1940, apply to transactions in Danish and Norwegian stock and other securities which unquestionably constitute a substantial portion of the property of those countries situated in the United States. With this interpretation of the statute, the order, and regulations, this committee is in agreement. It believes that when Congress enacted the act of March 9, 1933, it intended to grant to the President all of the powers conferred upon him by section 5 (b) of the act of October 6, 1917, and to authorize him to exercise all of such powers not only in time of war, but during any other period of national emergency. Under the original provision there is no doubt that the President was authorized to regulate transactions in stock and other securities, etc. Notwithstanding this apparent intention of the Congress, a few lawyers for banking institutions have expressed doubts as to whether the President is authorized to regulate transactions in foreign-owned stock and securities. The committee is convinced that the matter is of such great importance that doubts of this character should immediately be removed by a clarifying amendment. Not only is authority to regulate transactions in stock and other securities essential to the system of control already in force, but it may be of even greater importance if it becomes necessary to extend such control to property of other countries which to an even greater extent is in the form of stock and securities. Such an amendment will also serve to protect Americans complying with the order. The banks, in particular, would favor such a clarifying amendment.

The action taken by the President and the Treasury Department in regulating transactions in Danish and Norwegian property has received the unanimous approval of the public. Section 2 of the resolution provides Congress with a means of expressing its agreement as to the soundness, wisdom, and propriety of such action. Documents indicating the exact character of the action taken are printed as a part of this report.

Your committee believe that the resolution is meritorious legislation and should be promptly enacted into law.

APPENDIX

Executive Order of April 10, 1940, Regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury of April 10, 1940, and General Rulings Issued Thereunder

EXECUTIVE ORDER

Amendment of Executive Order No. 6560, Dated January 15, 1934, Regulating Transactions in Foreign Exchange, Transfers of Credit, and the Export of Coin and Currency

By virtue of the authority vested in me by section 5 (b) of the act of October 6, 1917 (40 Stat. 411), as amended by section 2 of the act of March 9, 1933 (48 Stat. 1), and by virtue of all other authority vested in me, I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, do hereby amend Executive Order No. 6560, dated January 15,, 1934, regulating transactions in foreign exchange, transfers of credit, and the export of coin and currency by adding the following sections after section 8 thereof:

"SEC. 9. Notwithstanding any of the provisions of sections 1 to 8, inclusive, of this order, all of the following are prohibited, except as specifically authorized in regulations or licenses issued by the Secretary of the Treasury pursuant to this order, if involving property in which Norway or Denmark or any national thereof has at any time on or since April 8, 1940, had any interest of any nature whatsoever, direct or indirect:

"A. All transfers of credit between any banking institutions within the United States; and all transfers of credit between any banking institution within the United States and any banking institution outside the United States (including any principal, agent, home office, branch, or correspondent outside of the United States, of a banking institution within the United States);

"B. All payments by any banking institution within the United States;

"C. All transactions in foreign exchange by any person within the United States;

"D. The export or withdrawal from the United States, or the earmarking of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency by any person within the United States; and

"E. Any transaction for the purpose or which has the effect of evading or avoiding the foregoing prohibitions.

"SEC. 10. Additional reports:

"A. Reports under oath shall be filed, on such forms, at such time or times and from time to time, and by such persons, as provided in regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with respect to all property of any nature whatsoever of which Norway or Denmark or any national thereof is or was the owner, or in which Norway or Denmark or any national thereof has or had an interest of any nature whatsoever, direct or indirect, and with respect to any acquisition, transfer, disposition, or any other dealing in such property.

"B. The Secretary of the Treasury may require the furnishing under oath of additional and supplemental information, including the production of any books of account, contracts, letters or other papers with respect to the matters concerning which reports are required to be filed under this section.

"SEC. 11. Additional definitions: In addition to the definitions contained in section 7, the following definitions are prescribed:

"A. The terms 'Norway' and 'Denmark,' respectively, mean the State and the Government of Norway and Denmark on April 8, 1940, and any political subdivisions, agencies, and instrumentalities thereof, including territories, dependencies, and possessions, and all persons acting or purporting to act directly or indirectly for the benefit or on behalf of the foregoing. The terms 'Norway' and 'Denmark,' respectively, shall also include any and all other governments (including political subdivisions, agencies, and instrumentalities thereof and persons acting or purporting to act directly or indirectly for the benefit or on behalf thereof) to the extent and only to the extent that such governments exercise or claim to exercise de jure or de facto sovereignty over the area which, on April 8, 1940, constituted Norway or Denmark.

"B. The term 'national' of Norway or Denmark shall include any person who has been or whom there is reasonable cause to believe has been domiciled in, or a subject, citizen, or resident of Norway or Denmark at any time since April 8, 1940, but shall not include any individual domiciled and residing in the United States on April 8, 1940, and shall also include any partnership, association, or other organization, including any corporation organized under the laws of, or which on April 8, 1940, had its principal place of business in, Norway or Denmark or which on or after such date has been controlled by, or a substantial part of the stock, shares, bonds, debentures, or other securities of which has been owned or controlled by, directly or indirectly, one or more persons, who have been, or whom there is reasonable cause to believe have been, domiciled in, or the subjects, citizens, or residents of, Norway or Denmark at any time on or since April 8, 1940, and all persons acting or purporting to act directly or indirectly for the benefit or on behalf of the foregoing.

"C. The term 'banking institution' as used in section 9 includes any person engaged primarily or incidentally in the business of banking, of granting or transferring credits, or of purchasing or selling foreign exchange or procuring purchasers and sellers thereof, as principal or agent, or any person holding credits for others as a direct or incidental part of his business, or brokers; and each principal, agent, home office, branch, or correspondent of any person so engaged shall be regarded as a separate 'banking institution.'

"SEC. 12. Additional regulations: The regulations of November 12, 1934, are hereby modified insofar as they are inconsistent with the provisions of sections 9 to 11, inclusive, of this order, and except as so modified are hereby continued in full force and effect. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and empowered to prescribe from time to time regulations to carry out the purposes of sections 9 to 11, inclusive, of this order, as amended, and to provide in such regulations or by rulings made pursuant thereto the conditions under which licenses may be granted by such agencies as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate."

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
April 10, 1940.

REGULATIONS RELATING TO TRANSACTIONS IN FOREIGN EXCHANGE TRANSFERS OF CREDIT, PAYMENTS, AND THE EXPORT OR WITHDRAWAL OF COIN, BULLION, AND CURRENCY; AND TO REPORTS OF FOREIGN PROPERTY INTERESTS IN THE UNITED STATES [1]

SECTION 130.1. Authority for regulations: These regulations are prescribed and issued under authority of section 5 (b) of the act of October 6, 1917 (40 Stat. 411), as amended by section 2 of the act of March 9, 1933 (48 Stat. 1), and Executive Order No. 6560, dated January 15, 1934, as amended.[1]

SEC. 130.2. Definitions: (a) The term "order" shall refer to Executive Order No. 6560, of January 15, 1934, as amended.

(b) The term "regulations" shall refer to these regulations.

(c) The terms "property" and "property interest" or "property interests" shall include, but not by way of limitation, money, checks, drafts, bullion, bank deposits, savings accounts, any debts, indebtedness or obligations, financial securities commonly dealt in by bankers, brokers, and investment houses, notes, debentures, stocks, bonds, coupons, bankers' acceptances, mortgages, pledges, liens or other right in the nature of security, warehouse receipts, bills of lading, trust receipts, bills of sale, other evidences of title or ownership, goods, wares, merchandise, chattels, stocks on hand, ships, goods on ships, real-estate mortgages, vendors' sales agreements, land contracts, real estate and any interest therein, leaseholds, ground rents, options, negotiable instruments, trade acceptances, royalties, book accounts, accounts payable, judgments, patents, trade-marks, copyrights, insurance policies, safe-deposit boxes and their contents, annuities, etc.

(d) Safe deposit boxes shall be deemed to be in the "custody" not only of all persons having access thereto but also of the lessors of such boxes whether or not such lessors have access to such boxes. The foregoing shall not in any way be regarded as a limitation upon the meaning of the term "custody".

(e) For the meaning of other terms reference should be made to the definitions contained in the order.[1]

SEC. 130.3. Licenses to engage in foreign exchange transactions, etc. Applications for licenses to engage in foreign-exchange transactions, transfers of credit, payments, or the export or withdrawal from the United States or the earmarking of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, involving property in which Norway or Denmark or any national thereof has at any time on or since April 8, 1940, had any interest of any nature whatsoever, direct or indirect, shall be filed in duplicate with the Federal Reserve bank of the district in which the applicant resides or has his principal place of business or principal office or agency, or with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York if the applicant has no legal residence or principal place of business or principal office or agency in a Federal Reserve district. Application forms may be obtained from any Federal Reserve bank, mint, or assay office, or the Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C. Applications shall be executed under oath before an officer authorized to administer oaths, or if executed outside of the United States, before a diplomatic or consular officer of the United States. The applicant shall furnish such further information as shall be requested of him by the Secretary of the Treasury or the Federal Reserve bank at which the application is filed. Licenses will be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, acting directly or through any agencies that he may designate, and by the Federal Reserve banks acting in accordance with such rules, regulations, and instructions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe, in such cases or classes of cases as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine in rules, regulations, and instructions prescribed by him. The Federal Reserve bank at which an application is filed will advise the applicant of the granting or denial of the license. When the transaction authorized by the license has been completed the license should be returned by the licensee to the Federal Reserve bank at which the application was filed, except in the case of licenses for the export or withdrawal of currency or gold or silver coin or bullion, in which case the license, after having been canceled by the collector of customs or the postmaster through whom the exportation or withdrawal was made, shall be sent by such collector of customs or postmaster to the Federal Reserve bank at which the application was filed. Appropriate forms for applications and licenses will be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. Licensees may be required to file reports upon the consummation of the transactions. The decision of the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to the approval or disapproval of an application shall be final.[1]

[1] Sec. 130.1 to 130.6; sec. 5 (b), 40 Stat. 415 and 966; sec. 2, 48 Stat. 1; 12 U. S. C. 95a; Ex. Order 6560, Jan. 15, 1934; Ex. Order 8389, Apr. 10, 1940.

SEC. 130.4. Reports of property interests of Norway and Denmark and nationals thereof:

(a) Within 10 days from the publication of these regulations in the Federal Register, reports shall be filed on Form TFR–100, duly executed under oath, containing the information called for in such form, with respect to all property situated in the United States on the date as of which the report is made in which Norway or Denmark or any national thereof has at any time on or since April 8, 1940, had any interest of any nature whatsoever, direct or indirect. Such reports shall be filed by—

(1) Every person in the United States directly or indirectly holding, or having title to, or custody, control, or possession of, such property including, without any limitation whatsoever of the foregoing, every partnership, association, or corporation organized under the laws of the United States or any State or Territory of the United States, or having its principal place of business in the United States, in the shares of whose stock or in whose debentures, notes, bonds, coupons, or other obligations or securities Norway or Denmark or any national thereof has at any time on or since April 8, 1940, had any interest of any nature whatsoever, direct or indirect; and

(2) Every agent or representative in the United States for Norway or Denmark or any national thereof having any information with respect to any such property: Provided, That no report on Form TFR–100 need be filed where the total value of all property interests to be reported is less than $250.

(b) The date as of which all reports on Form TFR–100 are required to be made is April 8, 1940.

(c) At the close of every business day in which there shall occur any acquisition, transfer, disposition, or any other dealing in any of the property interests designated in paragraph (a) above, a report or reports, on Form TFR–200, duly executed under oath, containing the information called for in such Form shall be filed by every person, agent, etc., referred to in paragraph (a) above: Provided, however, That such reports for the 10-day period from the date of publication of these regulations in the Federal Register may be filed at any time within such 10-day period.

(d) Neither filing nor the failure to file a report or reports required to be filed on Form TFR–100, nor the absence of a duty to file such report or reports shall in any way affect the duty to file a report or reports on Form TFR–200, and vice versa.

(e) Reports shall be executed and filed in triplicate with the Federal Reserve bank of the district in which the party filing the report resides or has his principal place of business or principal office or agency, or if such party has no legal residence or principal place of business or principal office or agency in a Federal Reserve district, then with the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. A report shall be deemed to have been filed when it is received by the proper Federal Reserve bank or when it is properly addressed and mailed and bears a postmark dated prior to midnight of the date upon which the report is due. At the close of each business day the Federal Reserve bank shall forward two executed copies of every report filed on that day to the Secretary of the Treasury.

(f) (1) All spaces in the report must be properly filled in. Reports found not to be in proper form, or lacking in essential details, shall not be deemed to have been filed in compliance with the order.

(2) Where space in the report form does not permit full answers to questions, the information required may be set forth in supplementary papers incorporated by reference in the report and submitted therewith. Supplementary documents and papers must be referred to in the principal statement in chronological or other appropriate order and be described in such manner that they can be identified.

(g) A separate report under oath must be filed by each person required to file a report except that persons holding property jointly may file a joint report.

(h) Upon a written request made to the Secretary of the Treasury by a party required to file a report, setting forth reasons why the report cannot be filed on or before the date such report is due, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may grant such an extension of time for making the report as under the circumstances shall appear to be required.

(i) Report Forms TFR–100 and TFR–200 may be obtained from any Federal Reserve bank, mint, or assay office, and the Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

SECTION 130.5. Penalties. Section 5 (b) of the act of October 6, 1917, as amended by section 2 of the act of March 9, 1933, provides in part:

"* * * Whoever willfully violates any of the provisions of this subdivision or of any license, order, rule, or regulation issued thereunder, shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, may be imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both; and any officer, director, or agent of any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation may be punished by a like fine, imprisonment, or both. As used in this subdivision, the term 'person' means an individual, partnership, association, or corporation." [1]

SECTION 130.6. Modification or revocation. These regulations and any forms or instructions issued hereunder may be modified or revoked at any time.[1]

H. MORGENTHAU, Jr.,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Approved, April 10, 1940.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

GENERAL RULING NO. 1 UNDER EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 8389, APRIL 10, 1940, AND REGULATIONS ISSUED PURSUANT THERETO, RELATING TO TRANSACTIONS IN FOREIGN EXCHANGE, ETC.

The Secretary of State has advised me as follows:

"Denmark and Iceland are two separate political entities. Acting under the authority of a provision of the Icelandic Constitution the Icelandic Parliament has, within the past few days, passed a resolution stating that since the King of Iceland is not now in a position to carry out his constitutional duties with respect to Iceland, the Icelandic Government has assumed for the time being the exercise of the royal prerogatives and the entire control of Icelandic foreign relations.

"In view of the foregoing it would not appear that Iceland falls within the definition of the term 'Denmark' in section 11 of the above-mentioned Executive order."

In view of the foregoing, the Treasury Department construes the term "Denmark" as used in the above-mentioned Executive order and regulations as not applying to Iceland.

H. MORGENTHAU, Jr.,
Secretary of the Treasury.

DATED APRIL 15, 1940.

GENERAL RULING NO. 2 UNDER EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 8389, APRIL 10, 1940, AND REGULATIONS ISSUED PURSUANT THERETO, RELATING TO TRANSACTIONS IN FOREIGN EXCHANGE, ETC.

Inquiry has been made as to whether the following are prohibited by the Executive order and the regulations issued thereunder except under license:

(a) The transfer by a banking institution within the United States of stock certificates from or into the names of "nationals" of Norway or Denmark; and

(b) The delivery out of custody accounts or the receipt in custody accounts, by a banking institution within the United States, of securities held or to be held in custody for "nationals" of Norway or Denmark.

The Treasury Department construes the Executive order and regulations as prohibiting such transactions, except under license.

H. MORGENTHAU, Jr.,
Secretary of the Treasury.

DATED APRIL 19, 1940.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, in section 9 of that proclamation we find that, insofar as the property in which Norway or Denmark or any national thereof has at any time on or since April 8, 1940, any interest of any nature whatsoever, direct or indirect, there is forbidden—all transfers of credit between any banking institutions within the United States; and all transfers of credit between any banking institution within the United States and any banking institution outside the United States.

And all payments by any banking institution within the United States, and all transactions in foreign exchange by any person within the United States.

Mr. President, if we really wish to confer, by this joint resolution, power to control the securities or transactions involving the securities of citizens of Denmark and Norway or the governments thereof, all we have to do is to say so, but it will be the Congress which does it. We do not have to extend this power beyond anything which has hitherto been granted to the President of the United States.

Mr. President, with that thought in mind I sent to the desk on Friday an amendment which I will call up at this time. In order that the clerk may the more readily identify it, I will read it:

On page 1, line 11, after the word "otherwise", insert the following: "the acts under which any foreign state or a national or political subdivision thereof, as defined by the President has any interest, following, to wit."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the clerk not be required to restate the amendment, but that it be offered in this fashion as the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, as I understand, that simply offers the amendment. It does not dispose of it.

Mr. DANAHER. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that my request was simply to avoid taking the time to cause the clerk to repeat what I have read.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is now the pending amendment?

Mr. DANAHER. That is now the pending amendment, I hope.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The ruling of the Chair is that it is the pending amendment.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Chair; and it is the pending amendment by itself, without my continuing with paragraph 2:

On page 2, lines 6, 7, and 8, strike out the words "in which any foreign state or a national or political subdivision thereof, as defined by the President, has any interest."

I ask unanimous consent that the two, taken together, be the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I did not quite understand the request of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me say to the Senator from New York that both proposals appear in the one printed amendment; and simply to save time, which had been my hope, I made the request. It is an amendment to strike out and insert. That is what it is. The Senator has the amendment on his desk, I am certain.

Mr. WAGNER. Is this the amendment which reduces the present power of the President?

Mr. DANAHER. It is. It transposes to page 1 the language of the clause appearing on page 2.

Mr. President, I have learned my lesson. Far from saving any time, I have taken about 4 minutes that I need not have taken if I had had the clerk read the amendment in the first place.

Let me say to the Senator from New York that the continuity of the pending joint resolution, if this amendment were adopted, would be as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the first sentence of subdivision (b) of section 5 of the act of October 6, 1917 (40 Stat. 411), as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"During time of war or during any other period of national emergency declared by the President, the President may, through any agency that he may designate, or otherwise, investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, the acts under which any foreign state or a national or political subdivision thereof, as defined by the President, has any interest, following, to wit: Any transactions in foreign exchange, tranfers of credit between or payments by or to banking institutions as defined by the President, and export, hoarding, melting, or earmarking of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, and any transfer, withdrawal, or exportation of, or dealing in, any evidences of indebtedness or evidences of ownership of property by any person within the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof; and the President may require any person to furnish, under oath, complete information relative to any transaction referred to in this subdivision or to any property in which any such foreign state, national or political subdivision has any interest, including the production of any books of account, contracts, letters, or other papers in connection therewith in the custody or control of such person, either before or after such transaction is completed."

SEC. 2. Executive Order No. 8389 of April 10, 1940, and the regulations and general rulings issued thereunder by the Secretary of the Treasury are hereby approved and confirmed.

Mr. President, in that way, if we transpose the modifying clause from page 2 to page 1, we will define a class of transactions in which a foreign government or its nationals may have an interest, and which may properly be the subject of Presidential control, whether by way of limitation or regulation or prohibition; and to that extent there will then be a proper conference of power upon the President. But if we take the language as it appears in the joint resolution, the President of the United States is by the joint resolution given unlimited power to regulate and control all transactions in foreign exchange, transfers of credits between, or payments by or to banking institutions so far as American citizens are concerned. There is not an American citizen who, except under license, may send a thousand dollars, if you like, to the Argentine to do business. He may not do business with Australia, if you choose, unless he gets a license. He may not make any transfer whatever of American funds into the foreign exchange of any nation whatever, regardless of whether it is at war or whether it is not, whether it is Norway or Denmark or any nation, unless he gets a license. I submit that the United States and her citizens are not at war; and the mere fact that there is an emergency overseas is not any reason in the world why we should be caused to submit to such restrictions and limitations upon our normal and natural rights as is thus contemplated.

So the pending amendment would achieve everything that is claimed to be the purpose of the pending joint resolution, namely, to prevent a sequestration by Germany of the avails of her unlawful and wrongful and, so far as we can now see, abominable aggression in Denmark and Norway. All gain to Germany by such conduct would be protected against; but, Mr. President, we could at the same time preserve to American citizens rights which have always been theirs, including the right to transact business with reference to evidences of bond and stock ownership, even though the securities in question have been held by foreigners, and many such transactions could and would be perfectly legitimate. In that particular there would be no loss of proper control if my amendment carries; for if there be sent to this country for sale, if you choose, or transfer upon our exchanges, securities from a nation which is at war—if it be Denmark, for instance, or Norway—under the pending joint resolution the Secretary of the Treasury would still have control, through the licensing provisions, as to the terms and the basis and the amount of the transaction, if you like. But, while we should properly give all the protection that is sought for in the joint resolution as to such nations or their citizens, we should not be limiting Americans in their right to do business.

In that particular the pending amendment reaches, it seems, to the heart of the joint resolution.

There is another phase of the matter which is worthy of note. There are high Government officials who are today engaged in the very realistic task of ascertaining how foreign securities held by nationals, or by nations, if you choose, abroad may be liquidated in our markets without depressing the American market and causing loss to American investors. That is a very real problem; and it is not too farfetched to say that there is under consideration at this minute a plan by which such securities, nationalized by countries at war, may be hypothecated through American corporations, may be made the basis of the issuance of credits through American banking institutions such as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and all such stocks and securities otherwise generally be subjected to regulation and control, even down to what person is going to be permitted to conduct the transaction.

Mr. President, we have never granted such omnibus power to our President in time of peace as is done by this resolution; and, with such thoughts, let me call to the attention of the Senate an article which appeared in this morning's Wall Street Journal entitled "New Bill Would Give President Broad Powers to Control Liquidation."

I ask that this article be inserted in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, there is another consideration, it seems to me, which ought to be brought out. In the remarks of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] on Thursday last, which commence in the RECORD at page 7647, he stated:

The purpose of the joint resolution, of course, is very clear. We want to protect property within the jurisdiction of the United States which is owned by these governments or their nationals.

"We want to protect property within the jurisdiction of the United States which is owned by these governments or their nationals."

Mr. President, if that be the avowed purpose of the joint resolution—and I submit that the remarks of the senior Senator from New York throughout the following pages bear out his claim that that is the avowed purpose of it—what of the rights of Americans in the circumstances? I submit that the way to achieve the purpose which is avowed and claimed for the joint resolution is to transpose the modifying clause from page 2 to the proper place on page 1, as has been proposed in the pending amendment, so that thereafter all legitimate American transactions may be carried forward without limitation and without regulation and without prohibition to be exercised in the discretion of any one man.

That concludes my remarks on this amendment.

[From the Wall Street Journal of Monday, April 29, 1940]

NEW BILL WOULD GIVE PRESIDENT BROAD POWERS TO CONTROL LIQUIDATION—PROVIDES LEGAL AUTHORITY IN EVENT EMERGENCY ACTION EVER BECOMES NECESSARY—SANCTIONS IMPOUNDING OF ASSETS

WASHINGTON.—Legislation granting to the President broad new powers to regulate or prohibit foreign liquidation of American securities will be placed before the Senate for action this week, possibly today.

Such authority, it was learned last night, is included in the new administration-sponsored bill legalizing the recent impounding of Danish and Norwegian funds and securities in this country.

Under the terms of the measure, the President is given authority to regulate or prohibit any transfer, withdrawal, or exportation of "any evidence of indebtedness" (bond) or "evidence of ownership of property" (stock) in which any foreign state or national has any interest.

This authorization was interpreted here as empowering the President to control or prohibit any liquidation of foreign-owned domestic securities. The only apparent reason for seeking such authority at this juncture is to provide undoubted legal sanction in the event emergency action ever becomes necessary. Administration quarters, it was pointed out, repeatedly have expressed complete satisfaction with the liquidation technique now being used by the Allied Governments.

MAY INCLUDE LIQUIDATION

It is expected that the question of broadening the emergency powers of the President to include liquidation of securities will be discussed when the legislation is brought up in the Senate.

The primary purpose of the legislation, officials say, is to legalize the April 10 order of President Roosevelt impounding American balances and securities in this country, title to which is in the name of Norway and Denmark. Secretary Morgenthau appeared before a congressional committee last week in support of the legislation to protect the Scandinavian funds against invaders not entitled to them.

Meanwhile, latest Treasury figures on liquidation of foreign-owned American securities show that during January net sales totaled $4,479,000, an increase over the low figure of $1,087,000 noted for last December. The greatest amount of foreign liquidation took place last October when the total net was $49,698,000, the Treasury announced.

English and Canadian investors reduced their holdings of domestic securities by $12,365,000 and $3,270,000, respectively, as against $10,189,000 and $3,338,000 in the preceding month.

SWISS, DUTCH HEAVY BUYERS

Switzerland and the Netherlands continued to be the heavy buyers of American securities during the month. Other nonbelligerent European countries also remained on the net purchase side of the ledger.

The total net capital movement between the United States and foreign countries showed an inflow of $37,595,000 in January compared with an inflow of only $5,046,000 in December 1939.

Foreign short-term balances increased from $2,948,035,000 on January 3 to $2,994,739,000 on January 31, and were $89,372,000 higher than on August 30, 1939.

British short-term balances declined $43,766,000 to $404,451,000 in January and since August 1939 have fallen $190,046,000. French funds rose to $290,591,000 in the month, but for the 5 months ended January 31 were off $25,262,000

The short-term balances of Belgium, Denmark, Finland, Norway, and Sweden appeared for the first time in the Treasury Bulletin. Also included for the first time were the balances of China, Japan, and the major South American countries.

BELGIUM'S BALANCE

Belgium's short-term balance at the close of January totaled $166,215,000; Denmark, $28,703,000; Finland, $23,822,000; Norway, $66,986,000; and Sweden, $162,385,000. All showed increases in the month, the largest being $20,156,000 for Sweden.

Of the far-eastern countries, China increased its balances here $6,476,000 to $171,888,000, while Japan, in January, showed little change at $57,969,000.

The trend of short-term balances in the United States of South American countries was mixed with Argentina up $8,756,000 to $66,465,000. Brazil declined $4,505,000 to $31,848,000; and Chile, $2,373,000 to $24,424,000. Mexico, with $62,100,000, showed an increase of $3,324,000.

United States balances abroad increased from $508,702,000 on January 3 to $533,043,000 on January 31. Balances in England increased $16,238,000, and in Japan, $9,045,000. On January 31 balances in Belgium amounted to $7,178,000; Denmark, $3,662,000; Finland, $1,213,000; Norway, $3,652,000; and Sweden, $6,487,000.

Foreign countries repatriated $12,298,000 of foreign securities in the United States, $7,443,000 of which was for Canada.

Brokerage balances were up $7,413,000 for the month, small declines being registered by England, France, and Germany. Canada showed an increase of $2,106,000; and Asia, $5,078,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

Mr. WAGNER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Danaher	King	Sheppard
Ashurst	Donahey	La Follette	Shipstead
Austin	Downey	Lodge	Slattery
Bailey	Ellender	Lucas	Smathers
Bankhead	Frazier	Lundeen	Smith

Clark, Idaho	Hughes	Russell	Wheeler
Clark, Mo.	Johnson, Calif.	Schwartz	White
Connally	Johnson, Colo.	Schwellenbach	Wiley

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I desire to take only a little time of the Senate in discussing the amendment which is up for consideration now. I merely wish to say that the joint resolution, as introduced, and as explained to the Senate, was for the purpose of clarifying certain language respecting the powers of the President to act in an emergency. The Senator from Connecticut in his proposed amendment does not in any way challenge the joint resolution which I offered simply to clarify the Trading With the Enemy Act of 1917, as amended by the act of 1933.

The Senator from Connecticut now proposes an amendment which was not considered by the committee. The distinguished Senator is a member of the committee. We went over the joint resolution in detail, and as a matter of fact the Senator made certain suggestions in the committee, not by way of amendment, but simply of interpretation. No amendment of this kind was suggested, although the full committee was present. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] were present representing the minority, and nearly every member of the majority was present. We discussed the measure in full, and reported it by unanimous vote.

What is the Senator's suggestion in these closing hours? Not in any way to oppose the clarifying amendment which I suggested, but drastically to amend the original law. In this critical time in the world's history, he would weaken the powers of the President to deal with other matters, such as transfers of foreign exchange and the transfer of credits from one bank to another, effected by American citizens. Under the Senator's amendment the President could not deal with these matters at all, whatever the emergency might be. Who knows what the situation will be tomorrow? We hear stories of what is going on in Europe, of other countries that may be drawn into this war. It may be that in all that critical situation we shall have to take action with respect to foreign-exchange transactions by American citizens as well as by nationals of foreign governments. The Senator from Connecticut would limit the power of the President now, so that in those cases the President will be powerless unless a foreigner is interested in the transaction.

Mr. President, it will be remembered that in 1933, because of a crisis that existed here, we had to regulate foreign exchange so as to prevent the flight of capital from our own country. In that case, American citizens were primarily involved. If I remember correctly—I do not want to inject any political argument into this discussion—when that was done in 1933, President Hoover himself tried in a way to explain that the serious depression which required that action resulted, not from conditions arising over here, not by anything of his doing or of his administration, but because of the impact of conditions in foreign countries.

Mr. President, who would have prophesied 2 years ago that rich countries such as Great Britain, France, Holland, Switzerland, Belgium, and others, would enact laws which absolutely control their foreign exchange, so as to prevent the flight of capital from their countries? All those countries, for their own economic protection, have had to enact such laws.

I do not say that the President will ever have to exercise that power. But how do we know what will happen tomorrow? In these closing hours, when we have a bill merely to clarify an existing law, it is proposed to take away from the President of the United States the power to deal perhaps with matters of the greatest national importance which may arise overnight and which may require immediate and sweeping action on his part.

If we are to deal with those powers—which have existed for 23 years without any question—if we are to consider taking away those powers from the President, then it ought to be done in a thorough, regular way. It should be done by the introduction of a bill, by hearings before committees, where all sides may present their views, so that we might know what consequences or complications may stem from our action.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator says that these powers have existed for more than 20 years, which, of course, is true. But is it not a fact that they were wartime powers granted the President of the United States when the United States itself was actually engaged in a war, and possibly permitted to stay on the statute books more or less by mistake, until the President reminded us of it by his proclamation of national emergency when the present European war started? In other words, the point I wish to suggest to the Senator from New York is that those were powers granted the President of the United States in his capacity as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States at a time when we were actually at war ourselves.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me, since the question has been presented, that there may be very grave doubt as to whether those powers ought to be permitted to remain when the United States is not actually at war itself, and whether their continued existence is not simply another step along the path of war.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken when he says that the law limits the action by the President to issue Executive orders in time of war. The original act did deal only with a wartime emergency, but in 1933 we were suffering from conditions which were quite as serious as any war conditions—a very serious depression. Congress recognized that there was a very serious flight of capital from the United States. Therefore Congress added to the powers of the President, so that he might deal with a crisis of that character as well as a wartime crisis. We amended the law in 1933 so as to confer upon the President emergency powers, or powers to deal with emergencies in time of peace. Without the actual exercise of that power we would have been in a very serious economic condition because of the flight of the dollar.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course, I say the title of this act itself, the "Trading With the Enemy Act," shows the purpose of the act. How could we have an enemy if we were not engaged in the war then? The very title of the act completely discloses the purpose of the act, which was to prevent certain things happening when we were actually engaged in a war ourselves.

The Senator from New York now says that this act has prevented the flight of capital. I think no one will dispute that fact. The President of the United States by his own authority has taken nearly all the capital of the United States and buried it in a hole in Kentucky. I do not believe that the extension of that power is necessary to enlarge the hole in Kentucky.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, we are not extending the power at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You are just enlarging the hole.

Mr. WAGNER. No; we are not extending the power, because even the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] does not object to the clarifying amendment which I have offered to the existing law. What I am saying is that we should not act in this hurried manner, without knowing just what crisis may arise tomorrow because of the situation in Europe and the Far East, without realizing what powers we may take away from the President or what emergencies may arise which will require quick action. To adopt the Senator's amendment would be to assume a responsibility which I would not want to assume, and I do not think the Senate would want to assume it.

It is clearly understood that the purpose of the joint resolution is merely to clarify an ambiguity. I think it would be most unfortunate for the Senate to give notice to the world—while the present crisis exists and may deepen, although I pray it will not—that we are actually so distrustful of the President's foreign policy that we are willing to reduce his powers. That would be a message of disunion which I should not like to have go out to the other countries of the world.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator says that the pending amendment ought not to be adopted because we do not know what will happen tomorrow. Is the Senator willing to suggest a date at which he thinks he will be able to prognosticate what will happen the next day in world affairs?

Mr. WAGNER. I cannot tell what emergency may arise tomorrow. However, in no case has the President exercised the power unless an emergency existed; and every time he has exercised it he has had the almost unanimous support of the American people. When the order respecting Danish and Norwegian credits was issued on April 10, not a single word of dissent was heard anywhere in the United States. Every newspaper which commented upon his action commented with approval. The comments of our leading citizens, as well as our leading statesmen, were to the effect that he did a very wise thing.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the President has already exercised the power, what need is there of the present joint resolution to authorize it?

Mr. WAGNER. Because, as I tried to explain the other day, a technical legal question arose. In my opinion the legal question raised is not well founded. Under the law as it exists today, the President, in my opinion, has a perfect right to prohibit, limit, or control evidences of indebtedness or evidences of ownership in which a foreign national has an interest. The Attorney General has so ruled, and so has the general counsel of the Treasury Department. No question was raised until one of the banking concerns in New York—I am now dealing with a realistic situation, and not mere conjecture—was called upon to transfer some securities owned by a Danish citizen to some other authority. The attorneys for the bank rendered an opinion stating a doubt existed as to whether the President had the right, as the law now reads, to deal with securities, common stock, or other evidences of indebtedness. There is no doubt that he had a right to deal with foreign exchange, or the transfer of credit from a bank in the United States to a bank outside the United States; but some question was raised as to whether this very important power, which I think everybody wants him to have, existed. To protect the banks, the joint resolution was introduced to clarify the power which I think it was always intended the President should have, and which in my opinion he does have.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection, it was not because the bank opposed the exercise of the power——

Mr. WAGNER. Oh, no.

Mr. BARKLEY. But simply in order that it might protect itself against any claim which might grow out of compliance in the event there was some doubt about the full authority. Of course, the Treasury does not wish to be drawn into a lawsuit in regard to the matter. It is very largely a matter of precaution.

While I am on my feet, I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], in connection with his rather facetious reference to a hole in the ground in Kentucky——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The hole is in Kentucky, is it not?

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, yes. It is in Kentucky; and there is a great quantity of gold there. It is there for safekeeping. The Government of the United States was well advised when it put the gold in Kentucky for safekeeping.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would not question that for a moment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not that it would not have been just as safe in Missouri. I do not mean to cast any aspersions on Missouri on that account. However, the power in question does not deal with the gold in Kentucky. The amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], if adopted, would make it possible for any American who was of a speculative disposition, and who was not particularly scrupulous about his methods, to sell American dollars. If he could sell enough of them he might drive down the price and obtain foreign exchange to advantage. Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut the President of the United States could not do anything to protect the dollar against that sort of manipulation if any American, through connivance with some foreigner or on his own account, should desire to manipulate the price of American dollars in order that he might obtain an advantage through dealing in foreign exchange.

Mr. WAGNER. The joint resolution does not absolutely prohibit any transaction. It simply contemplates, if an Executive order is issued, that each transaction be scrutinized to determine whether it was bona fide or accomplished through duress.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is right.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to say to the Senator from Kentucky that, of course, I made no objection to the selection of Kentucky as a site for the digging of the hole to put the money in. My remarks came about by reason of the remark of the Senator from New York that the purpose of the power was to prevent the flight of capital.

Of course, we have very efficaciously prevented the flight of capital by digging a hole and putting the money in the ground in Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gold represents capital. It is not necessarily capital.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is the capital itself.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not all by any means the property of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But it has been taken away from citizens.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand. The Government has not taken away any of the gold from citizens to whom it belonged. The gold has come into this country very largely in payment for goods which we sell to the nations of the world; and it is earmarked. We know how much of it belongs to any foreign country, and how much belongs to the Federal Reserve banks. Certificates of ownership are issued to the Federal Reserve banks showing their ownership in so much gold. It is not used, and may not be used, as part of our circulating medium. It is usable by the banks only in interbank transactions.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. However, it is capital.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, it represents capital.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And it is buried in the ground.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no danger of its being taken away or being subject to any flight of capital as long as it is protected by the Government of the United States. However, capital does not consist merely in uncoined gold. There are many forms of capital. Capital may be represented by securities of corporations. Certainly, such capital is not buried in Kentucky or anywhere else, and would not be.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I agree entirely with the Senator as to that.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gold is buried in my State; and the hole is no bigger or no more odious because it is in Kentucky than it would be if it were in some other State.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I agree entirely with the Senator. The soil in Kentucky is very good.

Mr. BARKLEY. Gold is really still the basis of our circulating medium. After all, we are still on the gold standard, because the law says that the gold dollar is still the standard of value in the United States. So there is nothing insidious about the sequestration of gold.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Nobody complains about that; but the Senator will agree with me that the fact still remains that after many fine speeches by the President of the United States, by the Senator from Kentucky, by his predecessor as majority leader, and by many others, against hoarding, the Federal Government itself actually gave the greatest exhibition of hoarding in the history of the world by taking all the gold and putting it down in Kentucky. When the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] talks about preventing the flight of capital, I say that we have had the greatest exhibition of preventing the flight of capital that the world has ever seen.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator contends that the protection and preservation of our monetary system is hoarding, all well and good. It may have been necessary for the Government of the United States to act on its own responsibility to hoard in order to keep the people from hoarding.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, we are getting into a rather irrelevant discussion. I do not want the Senator to misquote me. I did not say that the purpose of the joint resolution is to prevent the flight of capital from this country. No such emergency now exists. A reading of the joint resolution shows very clearly what its purpose is. What I said was that the power to regulate transactions in foreign exchange in case of an emergency is already conferred by law, and that the power was exercised only once—in 1933. It was fortunate that the President had the power to issue an Executive order regulating such transactions, because speculation was going on in foreign exchange to the detriment of our national interests and national security. We had to do what all the European countries are doing today. They have all enacted laws to control their foreign exchange so as to prevent speculation against their currencies. So I do not want the Senator to misquote me on that point.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I am certain the Senator knows that I did not intend to misquote him.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But the Senator repeatedly used the term "preventing the flight of capital," and that was the occasion for my remarks.

Mr. WAGNER. The power was exercised once to prevent the flight of capital, and its exercise was welcomed by the whole country. The President exercised the power in no other case. The power has never been abused, and has never been used except for the benefit of the country. That is why I say it is a unique procedure for a Senator to attempt to weaken the power of the President in a critical situation when no effort has been made in that direction during all these years since 1933. Nor was there any such effort made in the committee which met only a few days ago and unanimously reported the joint resolution.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield for a question.

Mr. DANAHER. For a question; very well. Will the Senator please tell what is meant by "ownership of property," in lines 5 and 6, on page 2? What does the word "property" mean?

Mr. WAGNER. It reads "evidences of ownership."

Mr. DANAHER. Yes; but what does the word "property" include?

Mr. WAGNER. I think common stock would be an evidence of ownership. Does the Senator want to clarify that language?

Mr. DANAHER. I wondered if the Senator from New York would tell the Senate what is meant by "property." It is his joint resolution.

Mr. WAGNER. I think everybody knows what "evidence of property" is. It is evidence one has that he owns certain property. If a person has common stock or a deed, he owns an interest in a certain enterprise or certain property. That is what the "evidence of ownership" means.

Mr. DANAHER. Is the Senator familiar with the definition which has been given by the Treasury Department in their regulations as to what they would undertake to control, if we should pass this joint resolution?

Mr. WAGNER. Does the Senator mean in the Executive order?

Mr. DANAHER. I ask if the Senator knows, if we should pass this joint resolution, what kind of property the Treasury Department would undertake to control?

Mr. WAGNER. I read the Executive order, and I think it is all right.

Mr. DANAHER. Will the Senator permit me to read it into the RECORD at this point?

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator can read it into the RECORD in his own time.

Mr. DANAHER. Very well. I ask if the Senator will permit me to do so now?

Mr. WAGNER. In his own time the Senator can do that.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Connecticut was present at the subcommittee meeting; he was present at the general meeting of the committee; and he heard the explanation of what was designed to be done, both from the Secretary of the Treasury and from the general counsel of the Treasury. He knows what the Attorney General construes concerning this proposed amendment to the existing law. He knows what the Under Secretary of the Treasury proposed, but the Senator from Connecticut sat there and never dreamed of offering one single, solitary suggestion. Now, however, he comes here and, without any hearing whatsoever, proposes to upset everything the committee has done. He has given us Solomonic exposition of the difficulties which are going to occur—not one of which has ever occurred. The plain intent of the joint resolution, as the Senator knows perfectly well, is to prevent Germany from appropriating the property now in the United States belonging to the two nations she is now overwhelming. No other suggestion was made at all.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me say to the Senator from Virginia that I agree with that purpose, and hope we can achieve it.

Mr. GLASS. But the Senator is trying to upset it now, without any hearing whatsoever or any action by the committee of which he is a member; and he voted to report the joint resolution.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield further?

Mr. WAGNER. I have yielded the floor.

Mr. DANAHER. Very well.

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WAGNER. Does the Senator from Connecticut desire to ask me a question?

Mr. DANAHER. No; I thought the Senator from New York had the floor, and I wanted to make certain. I thank the Senator.

Let me say to the Senator from Virginia what I am trying to have Senators realize in the consideration of the joint resolution is the very thing those members of the committee who were present at the committee meeting did not realize when they were there. Let me say to the Senator from Virginia that the Secretary of the Treasury came in and asked within the first 2 minutes he was there if he could turn over the explanation of the joint resolution to the general counsel of the Treasury, Mr. Foley, because he said, "I am a farmer; I do not know what the law is." That is what he said to us; that is all the explanation we got from Mr. Morgenthau. Then Mr. Foley undertook to explain it; and I will say to the Senator from Virginia that up to that minute we had never seen even a draft of this proposed resolution; and insofar as hearings are concerned, we had a hearing in which Mr. Foley, from the Treasury Department, undertook to explain what he said evidences of indebtedness and evidence of ownership of property meant.

Mr. GLASS. Did the Senator from Connecticut raise any objection to his explanation?

Mr. DANAHER. I certainly did not.

Mr. GLASS. Did the Senator ask him any questions?

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Virginia that I willingly and gladly voted to report the joint resolution from the committee; I would vote now to report the joint resolution, but I say to the Senator from Virginia that this is the place to consider this proposed legislation, and to consider it in its full intendment.

Mr. GLASS. The Committee on Banking and Currency is the place to consider the legislation and the matter which the Senator raises has never been brought to the attention of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. DANAHER. That is correct, and that is why we ought to consider it here.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I wish to remind him that we did discuss in the committee some of the powers granted by the present act. It was then that the Senator from Virginia said to the Senator who raised the question, "Very well, do you want to propose any amendment?" And the Senator said, "No; I do not propose any amendments." Then I, as chairman, said, "Is there anybody here who desires to suggest any amendment or is any further hearing required?" The committee, as the Senator knows—he was very much interested and sat right next to me——

Mr. DANAHER. Indeed, I was interested.

Mr. WAGNER. The committee unanimously voted approval of the joint resolution.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, my attitude was and is that I should like, in an orderly and right way, to prevent Germany from stealing the property of the nations it has undertaken to conquer, but if we cannot do it in that way, I am in favor of doing it in the wrong way.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. DANAHER. I respect the position of the Senator from Virginia; I respect his valuable assistance to the Senate in his many long years of service to our country. That is precisely what he told us in the committee. He said, "I am in favor of doing it the right way if we can, but I am in favoring of doing it the wrong way if we cannot do it the right way." Is not that correct?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; certainly that is correct.

Mr. DANAHER. When the committee voted, as the Senator from New York says, it did not vote approval of the measure but voted to report it to the floor of the Senate. That is what we did do, and I am glad the committee reported it, because we are having an opportunity for the first time to let the people realize that instead of merely reaching property of Denmark and Norway, as was the announced purpose of the joint resolution, we are now extending the power of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury over all transactions described in the joint resolution of the people of the United States, regardless of where they may reside.

Mr. GLASS. No Member of this body has ever opposed delegation of power more than I have; I have voted against it every time; but this is not the way to circumscribe the President's power. A single Senator, who is not willing to go before his own committee, the Banking and Currency Committee, and present his proposition and have it there considered after hearing, brings it here on the floor without any hearing, without any committee action. I am utterly opposed to the proposition.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not true that but for the doubt cast upon the exercise of the authority which the President thought he had, which the Treasury thought he had, and which the Attorney General held he had, this joint resolution would not be here?

Mr. GLASS. Of course not.

Mr. BARKLEY. The mere fact that Norway and Denmark happen to be the two nations with respect to which the proclamation and Executive order were issued does not make the joint resolution a law, as the Senator from Connecticut contends, that widens the powers of the President to do this thing, regardless of an emergency, but under the very act itself the President must declare an emergency to exist before he issues the Executive order.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, the best information was that he could do it under existing law.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true.

Mr. GLASS. But it was desired to avoid the complications which might follow litigation. That is the only reason the joint resolution is here.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? I do not think he meant to say what he did say, that he wanted the people to know that we are now passing a law which may permit the President to deal with an emergency, no matter what country may be involved. That is the law today, and we are not attempting to amend the law in that respect. What the Senator proposes is to restrict the powers that have existed for 23 years, or at least since 1933.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me reply briefly and say to the Senator from Virginia that he should recall that a meeting was called for the Banking and Currency Committee for half-past two last Wednesday afternoon. If there was any Senator on our side of the aisle who knew the purpose of that meeting, I do not know who he was; certainly I did not. But, in any event, I was there at half-past two. I attended the meeting, which lasted at least 40 minutes, and Thursday afternoon, the following day, the Senator from New York undertook to tell the Senate that he did not know what was going to happen over night; that it was necessary to pass the joint resolution in about 8½ minutes, and he had to get unanimous consent for the purpose or else the dire result of the German invasion of Norway and Denmark would be visited upon the American people. I do not remember all he said, but the RECORD shows, and I made reference to it this morning. The fact of the matter is that he did not get unanimous consent then to consider the joint resolution, and it went over. We had Friday on which to transact business, and he did not call up the joint resolution on Friday. It was made the order of business for today, and today when he comes before the Senate and himself offers an amendment to the joint resolution and that amendment has been accepted.

Mr. President, now what he is proposing to do and what the joint resolution would do is to extend the existing power to evidences of indebtedness and evidences of ownership of property. The Treasury Department undertook to define property; and on April 10, 1940, this is what they were undertaking to control by this joint resolution. They were going to control the "property interests," which—

> Shall include, but not by way of limitation, money, checks, drafts, bullion, bank deposits, savings accounts, any debts, indebtedness or obligations, financial securities commonly dealt in by bankers, brokers, and investment houses, notes, debentures, stocks, bonds, coupons, bankers' acceptances, mortgages, pledges, liens or other right in the nature of security, warehouse receipts, bills of lading, trust receipts, bills of sale, other evidences of title or ownership, goods, wares, merchandise, chattels, stocks on hand, ships, goods on ships, real-estate mortgages, vendors' sales agreements, land contracts, real estate and any interest therein, leaseholds, ground rents, options, negotiable instruments, trade acceptances, royalties, book accounts, accounts payable, judgments, patents, trade-marks, copyrights, insurance policies, safe-deposit boxes and their contents, annuities, etc.

Mr. President, those are the things over which the President is trying to get control.

Mr. GLASS. And that is what was done 23 years ago. He has control over them now. Unhappily, the Solomon from Connecticut was not here to prevail upon Congress to accept his view.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I respect, of course, the senior Senator from Virginia. I am no Solomon from Connecticut or anywhere else; but if I were, Mr. President, and if I had been here in 1933, when the Senator from Virginia voted for the amendment to the act which struck out of the wartime powers this language regarding evidences of ownership and evidences of indebtedness, if I had thought it necessary and desirable I would have put it back in. The Senator from Virginia, a former Secretary of the Treasury, then knew that the President of the United States had no such peacetime power as would extend to that list of property under evidences of indebtedness. Consequently, it was purposely and willfully and legislatively omitted from the 1933 amendment, and it is not now in the law, and that is why the advocates of this measure are trying to put it in, and yet they say they are not trying to extend the power of the President to a hitherto unencompassed field. It is perfectly preposterous.

Mr. President, I do not claim to be any kind of a Solomon; but I do know that I have in my hand a piece of legislation which we are undertaking to construe, word by word, and find out what it means. In this case we are undertaking to extend the power of the President to hitherto unknown fields. If that is what the Congress of the United States wishes to do, it has the right to do it, but it should not do it in the name simply of protecting Danish and Norwegian securities against German sequestration. I am willing to do that. That may be done under the amendment I submitted, and under the joint resolution as drawn; but, Mr. President, let us not have any talk here to the effect that we had an opportunity to be heard, we had an opportunity to correct the law, we had an opportunity to do this and that. None of us ever even saw this proposal until we entered the committee room. We have had a chance to see it since then, and we have had a chance to correlate it with the existing law; and we find that there is a usurpation and a brand new extension of authority and power.

For my part, I submit that the amendment which is pending will cure the situation, will permit the Treasury and permit the President to regulate and, in fact, prohibit the transfer of American-owned securities in which foreign governments or their nationals have an interest—Germany or anybody else. That can be accomplished; but there is no reason in the world why we should not limit the effect of the amendment in such fashion as that it will not inveigh against the normal peacetime operations of citizens of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I have listened to what the Senator from Connecticut has to say about the so-called extravagant grants of power to the President of the United States in this joint resolution. It seems to me the joint resolution should be enacted in substantially the form in which it was reported by the committee. If it is sound for us to adopt this policy with reference to cash and checks, why should we not extend it to certificates of indebtedness and the ownership of stocks? Are they any more sacred than cash?

I thought money—actual money, sure enough money, silver money, gold money, or paper money if it is backed by gold—was the desideratum of all stock operations, and checks, and everything else. It is cash. If the President is to be given authority over cash—he already has it, for that matter—why should we not include certificates of indebtedness of any kind, and ownership of stock certificate? If we do not do that, we simply open up a loophole whereby there could be a pretended exchange of cash for stock certificates, and the stock certificates would not be subject to control, and the act would probably be nullified to that extent.

I see no harm in giving the President power to do those things. We in America certainly have a right to determine the conditions under which the property of foreigners may be transferred; have we not? Who has, if we have not? The joint resolution is general legislation. It is not to be enacted simply for the purposes of the present situation with regard to Denmark and Norway. It would have applied in the Spanish civil war. It would have applied in the war between Ethiopia and Italy.

It is applying now to the World War between the Allies on one side and Germany on the other side. So what is wrong with making it all-embracing? Either we should not take the step at all, or we should go the whole way. We should repeal the present act entirely, or we should make it comprehensive, so that it will operate in a fair and equitable manner.

If a foreigner has a certificate of stock in America, I take it that stock ought to be protected just as well as the money it represents.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Suppose an individual living in Denmark or Norway—they happen to be the two countries concerned now, but it might as well be an individual living in Belgium or Holland, if the situation should develop, or Italy, or some other country—has a million dollars in an American bank. Under the present law, nobody doubts that the President may protect that American money in an American bank to the credit of a foreigner. Suppose the same foreigner has a million dollars' worth of stock in General Motors or the Pennsylvania Railroad: The property represented by the stock is in the United States, but the stock may be in the capital of some nation that has been overrun by the troops of another nation.

Mr. CONNALLY. To be sure.

Mr. BARKLEY. By coercion, or duress, or some other influence, that stock might be delivered up to representatives of the invading government; and the result would be that by a sort of coercion or duress the million dollars, if the stock brought that amount on the market, could be taken charge of by the government that undertook to get it in that way.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the difference? All of the stock represents property in the United States, anyway.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly. I thoroughly agree with the Senator, and thank him for his observation.

For instance, the stock certificate might apparently be properly endorsed. It would not show the coercion. It would not show the bayonet sticking in the ribs of the man who owned it when he signed the transfer. I am talking about the citizen of Denmark, Norway, or any other foreign country. The transfer, the endorsement in blank of the certificate, would not reveal the bayonet sticking up right under the fifth rib of the owner of the certificate. It would not reveal the threat of the jail out yonder. There would be nothing about it that would enable one to hear the clanking of the owner's chains if he did not sign the transfer.

But if we permit foreigners to invest their money here, we owe them some duty. We owe a duty to foreign countries; and when the nationals of those countries invest in our securities, we owe them at least the duty, if we can exercise it, of seeing that they are not defrauded, that they are not robbed, that they are not "highjacked" out of their property. We should do all we can to preserve the sanctity of investments if we permit foreigners to make them here at all. So it seems to me this proposed legislation is in the interest of good will and security.

How many foreigners would send their money over here if they knew in advance that we would be indifferent to its sanctity? Why are they now sending gold and securities to the United States? Because there is an international belief and an international faith in the integrity of the United States Government, that it will protect and safeguard and secure the property even of aliens, that is legally and lawfully in the United States. I do not want to surrender anything of that kind. I do not want the United States to lose anything in the estimation of the world in regard to our willingness to treat aliens and foreigners in a fair and just and equitable manner. I think the enactment of this legislation will go a long way toward maintaining and sustaining that estimation of our attitude, and that its failure will subtract from that estimation which the world has.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. As I understood the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], he made some reference to extending to the rights of American citizens the powers in the hands of the President. As I understand, that would not occur unless the rights of American citizens were in some way related to the emergency which the President would announce in the beginning. Is that correct?

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not hear everything the Senator from Connecticut said. The Senator from Connecticut is here, and I will yield to him, if he desires, to answer the Senator from Indiana on that point.

Mr. MINTON. As I understood the Senator from Connecticut, he said that this joint resolution grants to the President of the United States a large power over the rights of American citizens. What I was inquiring was whether or not those powers over the rights of American citizens extended only to those citizens whose rights in some way related to the emergency.

Mr. DANAHER. Does the Senator wish me to answer him?

Mr. MINTON. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Briefly. I yield only for an answer to the question, not for an address.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me say to the Senator from Indiana that all the joint resolution down to page 2, lines 5 and 6, applies only to American citizens. In one aspect of the matter, if we adopt the amendments that are contemplated in line 5, it may be said to apply to any evidence of indebtedness or any evidence of ownership of property in which any foreign government or a national thereof has an interest; and from then on, and to that extent, we have amended the existing law.

Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. MINTON. Yes; I think it answers my question, if I correctly understand the statement of the Senator to be that the property of the citizen will in some way be related to the country that is supposed to be in a condition of emergency.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I answer the question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. It has been the law for 23 years. Can the Senator recall a single instance in which there has been complaint?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have heard no complaint, and I am sure that if there had been any complaint the Senator from Virginia would have heard about it.

Mr. MINTON. Does it not all come down finally to what the Senator from Virginia has just stated, namely, to the question whether or not we will trust the President to go ahead further with the exercise of this power which Presidents of the United States have had for 23 years?

Mr. CONNALLY. In essence, that is the question.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The first two lines of the present law and of the pending joint resolution fix the conditions under which these things can be done.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. "During time of war." That may be a war in which we are engaged, or it may not be; but, if we assume it is a war in which we are engaged, the President may do these things. "Or during any other period of national emergency declared by the President."

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. He has to declare an emergency before he can do any of the things referred to in the present law or in the pending joint resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from Kentucky, the Senator from Indiana, the Senator from Virginia, and the Senator from Connecticut for their illuminating interruptions.

The matter involved is the title and ownership to the property affected. Whether it be a stock certificate, or a check, or a piece of money, it is all property. The object is to give the Government some power of regulation and control over the transfer of ownership.

If I go into a pawnbroker's shop and find my watch, which some light-fingered gentleman may have lifted from my pocket while I was at the theater, or in the Senate restaurant, or somewhere else, if the pawnbroker knew that that watch was stolen, he was guilty of a criminal offense and would be liable to be put in the penitentiary or the workhouse, because he accepted property knowing it to have been stolen. If a check goes into a bank bearing a fraudulent endorsement, and the bank has reasonable notice that the check is forged, though it does not have to know it absolutely, it gets no title to the money or the check by taking it.

So it is with the proposed amendment of the law. The bankers have raised the point that if evidences of indebtedness and certificates of stock are presented and are properly endorsed, so far as the surface is concerned, they must accept them, though they may have been obtained by duress or through coercion or fraud. How can anyone object to giving the President, through his proper instrumentality, the right to investigate such a case? If such investigation shows that there was a proper transfer, that it was a transfer for value, that it was a transfer in good faith and upon honorable terms, does anyone contend that the President of the United States would decline permission to transfer the title? I do not think any Senator would so contend.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to ask the Senator a question as to a definition. As I understand, the words to be added are "evidences of indebtedness." I was wondering whether the Senator was accurate in saying that that would include stock certificates.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; but is there not another clause? It says "evidences of ownership of property." I was following the thought of the Senators who are presenting the joint resolution, and their contention is that the language "evidences of ownership of property" would include stock certificates. In other words, a certificate is merely an evidence that one owns so many shares of stock. I may be in error.

Mr. ADAMS. I understood the Senator to be including stock certificates under evidences of indebtedness.

Mr. CONNALLY. No. I referred to evidences of ownership of property.

Mr. WAGNER. A bond would be an evidence of indebtedness.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. If it were possible to convert the property into cash, and an American citizen sent that cash to Denmark or Norway, under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut that would be a matter with which the President could not deal, as an emergency, at all, because the Senator now proposes to limit the power so that if an American citizen is interested, the regulations cannot apply. That would make the way wide open for all sorts of subterfuge.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from New York. It seems to me we should perfect the existing act by including all these kinds of property, or we should repeal it and do nothing about the matter at all.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. I merely wish to call to the attention of the Senator from New York the fact that there is no sense in the world in anyone's trying to claim either a debit or credit balance, respectively, in international exchange unless there is something tangible with which to make it good. The fact of the matter is that we have our gold buried here. In order to make good any credit balance, well established, if we do not make gold available under license, or furnish goods, no one gets it, and we always hold that control over it. That may be one answer to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONNALLY. Suppose the Senator, anticipating a pleasure journey to Sweden or Denmark or Norway, should send over a certificate for $2,000, or five thousand, according to the amount of pleasure he anticipated, and deposited it in a bank in Sweden or Denmark. He would not have to get foreign exchange. He would deposit it in a bank over there. That would meet the situation pointed out by the Senator.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. If that were an undertaking to which I might be committed, supposing I would anticipate two-fifths as much pleasure in the one case as in the other, the fact is that I would get none unless the President gave me a license.

Mr. CONNALLY. Frankly, if the Senator contemplated a trip to Denmark or Norway during the pendency of the present war, I think it would be wise for the President to refuse him funds and keep him at home, and not endanger his life, or his useful public service, the distinguished career which he has already initiated, and is pursuing with great vigor. [Laughter.]

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. Will the Senator express his view as to how he would feel if he himself wanted to make a similar transaction with the Argentine, for instance, or with some other country in South America, wholly unrelated to the war, but nonetheless a foreign state?

Mr. CONNALLY. If there were an emergency which threatened the national welfare, why should I not suffer some inconvenience, if I could thereby contribute to the alleviation of the emergency? Many American soldiers went across 3,000 miles of ocean and died on the fields of France because we were in a national emergency.

Is it any hardship for a Senator, with a fine office, a big automobile, and all that, to withhold sending a little money to Argentine, or getting on a boat, if necessary, and going there, if we are in a national emergency and if his remaining at home would lessen the emergency? I do not think so.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I inquire what amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is now being considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). The amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] is now before the Senate.

Mr. WILEY. Does the Senator's amendment deal with language on page 1 of the joint resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; on page 1, line 11, and on page 2, lines 6, 7, and 8.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I wish to speak briefly to the joint resolution itself. As I understand the purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, it is to limit the power the President now has so that he may not exercise it in relation to transactions by American citizens. I wish briefly to state my ideas on that subject.

We know that last year in Europe, long before the Nazis struck, they infiltrated the countries they were going to strike with what we now recognize as the "fifth column." That "fifth column" has special application to the pending joint resolution. The Nazis would send a group into the country they meant to conquer. That group would become acquainted with the whole financial structure of that country—their corporations, directorates, holdings abroad, and so forth.

I happen to know that in Norway the majority of the stock of any Norwegian corporation must be owned by Norwegian citizens for the simple reason that then those citizens can determine who shall be the directors of the corporation. Norway today has the third or fourth largest merchant marine in the world, and one way for the Nazis to obtain control of that merchant marine would be to get control of the majority of stock, and then vote themselves in as directors of the corporations. Americans are interested in some of these mercantile organizations.

Some months ago there was published in an American magazine an article written by a gentleman who had visited one of the countries of Europe and had seen how this infiltration went on.

Mr. President, we are interested in that situation not only for the reason that Norwegians and Swedes have investments in their own corporations but many Americans have investments in Norwegian and Swedish corporations in the same way that citizens of foreign countries have investments in our corporations. I feel that the object of the measure itself, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York particularly, is one to which we should give real consideration, and that the legislation should be passed.

I wish to refer to one other matter. By the passage of the joint resolution, which is virtually a reenactment of existing law, we give notice to the ruthless marauders and brigands of the world that, so far as America is concerned, we will protect the private property of the citizens of those nations which are ruthlessly invaded, and that we stand for international law, according to which the private property of a citizen in an invaded country may not be confiscated. Under the policy pursued by the invaders, private property now has no sacredness. It becomes the property of the invaders.

As to the particular amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, it seems to me it presents the question whether or not we want to limit the President of the United States to the protection of the property in this country belonging to the citizens of foreign countries. I believe we should also protect the rights of the citizens of this country in their property interest in foreign corporations.

At this time I personally feel that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut should not be adopted.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, this morning I read a very interesting editorial published in the columns of the Washington Times-Herald, which appears to be a reprint from the New York Daily News, entitled "The C. C. C. Is O. K., But—"

I may state at the outset that I became interested in that article for the reason that since 1936 our appropriations for national defense have been doubled, and we are now engaged in spending hundreds of millions of dollars, totaling into the billions, in order that we may provide for ourselves an adequate national defense, which millions of dollars I hope are being expended for the purpose of developing forces for defense purposes only, and not for the purpose of participating in any of the quarrels of Europe or in the wars of Asia.

Mr. President, in connection with strengthening our national defense, I have from time to time, for a number of years, advocated that we inaugurate military training in the C. C. C. camps, believing as I did then, and as I do now, that we should unquestionably make utilization of the opportunity presented to provide military training for the boys who are now in those camps, and which I believe we should have provided for the 2,500,000 who received work in those camps since the inauguration of the C. C. C.

I read the article in the form of an editorial that I mentioned a moment ago, published in the Times-Herald, from the pen of Captain Patterson, the editor and publisher of the New York Daily News. He writes:

> C. S. Marsh, former educational director of the Civilian Conservation Corps (C. C. C.), contributes to the Forum magazine an interesting article on the C. C. C.'s achievements to date.
> It is a notable record that this most popular, most widely approved New Deal agency has rolled up.
> In the 7 years since it was established, the C. C. C. has "graduated" about 2,500,000 young men, who have stayed with it an average of 9 months each.

Then the editorial quotes a paragraph from the article of Mr. Marsh, as published in the Forum. Captain Patterson in his editorial continues:

> You could hardly ask better returns than those for the money the taxpayers have put into the C. C. C.
> We're in accord, too, with Mr. Marsh's expressed hope that the C. C. C. may soon be placed by Congress on a permanent basis. The Agriculture and Interior Departments have mapped out 30 years' more conservation work that needs to be done in this country, and the C. C. C. is the logical outfit to do the bulk of that work.
> Congress has now continued the C. C. C. to July 1, 1943. On or before that date, we hope the corps will be established as a permanent Federal Government agency, and a highly important one.

Mr. President, I think the American people, as a whole, are entirely in accord with the National Legislature, our Congress, in the conviction that the C. C. C., this New Deal agency, has done a marvelous work, not only in the development of certain resources of our country, but in the actual preservation of others. I know of no more humanitarian action we could possibly have taken during the trying days, 7 years ago, when we were legislating for the establishment of these camps. At that time there were hundreds of thousands of young men, the flower of our citizenship, who unfortunately were unable to secure positions here, or there, or anywhere. They were wandering around the streets of the great metropolitan centers of our country unable to locate themselves in employment.

By providing them with an opportunity to develop themselves mentally as well as physically, we also fortunately provided them with an opportunity to help their mothers and fathers, many of whom were aged and unfortunately were not possessed of any worldly goods. They were financially embarrassed and physically depleted and unable to care for themselves. In addition, at that time their sons had no opportunities for employment. By the inauguration of the C. C. C. camps we not only provided employment for hundreds of thousands of young men—an average of 300,000 annually—but we gave them an opportunity to contribute to the welfare, maintenance, and support of their mothers and fathers. As we recall, $20 out of every $30 a month paid to a C. C. C. boy goes to his parents for their support. I have yet to hear of a single case of a man in any C. C. C. camp who has refused to contribute or complained that he was forced to make a monthly contribution to his parents.

Mr. President, all this is evidence—certainly to my mind—that America will never be in any danger so long as the sons and daughters of America respect their parents. If we are desirous of ascertaining the character of any young man or woman, we have but to inquire whether or not he is interested in the comfort, happiness, and contentment of his parents. I am proud of the boys of the C. C. C. camps. The probabilities are that eventually, at the expiration of the present period in 1943, the Congress of the United States will decide to continue this organization as a permanent part of the American Government.

Captain Patterson in his editorial continues:

At this point, however, we part company with Mr. Marsh. Because at this point Mr. Marsh goes into a superpacifist dance which became antique and outmoded the moment Europe went to war again last fall.

Mr. Marsh thanks the C. C. C.'s allegedly lucky stars that it has been devoted to building strong and characterful and peaceable young men; that no breath of military activity has ever sullied its fair set-up. "The C. C. C.," he exults, "has never been more military than the Boy Scouts."

Though Mr. Marsh praises the Army for its management of the C. C. C. up to now, we seem to read between his lines a hope that the Army may be dislodged from C. C. C. supervision pretty soon and a bunch of bureaucrats and professional uplifters be put in charge.

Of course, this kind of talk about the C. C. C. always has been the bunk. Since Europe went back to war it has become dangerous bunk to boot.

Though most of us want to stay out of this war, our interventionists and hystericals may yet drag us into it.

I hope not, Mr. President.

Our State Department further is just after warning Japan to keep out of the Dutch East Indies though the Netherlands fall to Hitler as Denmark did. That warning may mean war for us in the Pacific.

I hope not, Mr. President. I realize, of course, that the probabilities are that the greater portion of essential materials of war, in the form of tin and rubber, comes from the Dutch East Indies and the British East Indies; but I hope we shall never find occasion to take up arms in the Pacific, regardless of the fact that during peacetime we are daily in need of supplies of tin, rubber, and materials of that sort, which we would need in great quantities during wartimes.

Speaking of tin and rubber, I suggest that we interest ourselves more thoroughly in the development of the tin mines which are to be found plentifully in one of our sister republics to the south—namely, Bolivia—and that we lend encouragement to some of our industrialists in their desire to develop rubber plantations in the Yucatan portion of Mexico, in some of the Central American countries, and particularly in Brazil.

The captain continues:

Our Navy is our first line of defense.

I disagree with him. A number of years ago, prior to the time the first airplane made its flight in my State of North Carolina, I was of the opinion that the Navy was our first line of defense; but times have changed. Today I believe that our first line of defense is the airplane. I believe that air power has outmoded naval power. By the way, speaking of airplanes and battleships, the other day I read with much interest the printed account of a debate between our Secretary of the Navy and our colleague, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], in reference to battleships and airplanes. The debate was presented through the columns of the Washington Daily News, which, with other daily newspapers of the country, carries that feature each Saturday.

The Secretary of the Navy ventured the opinion that battleships are indeed our first line of defense. He said he believed that the Navy is the arm upon which we now depend, and must always depend, or words to that effect, because John Adams, a President of the United States, believed that the Navy was the first line of defense.

I was somewhat surprised at that statement, because John Adams never heard of an airplane. A phenomenal development has taken place within the past few years in the development of air power. If one is desirous of making a comparison between the value and the work of battleships of the Navy and airplanes, one has but to take into consideration the fact that one battleship costs $80,000,000. Two big ships which we now have in contemplation, of 45,000 tons each, will cost approximately $100,000,000 each. For $100,000,000 we can buy a tremendous fleet of battle planes, capable of traveling at the rate of 400 miles an hour and transporting without difficulty, at an altitude of 10,000 to 20,000 feet, many tons of high explosives. In making the comparison, one might well consider the fact that a battleship requires 11 days to proceed southward from San Francisco to the Canal, through the locks, and northward to the city of New York, whereas a fleet of battle planes, costing no more than one battleship, and carrying tons of high explosives, can negotiate the distance from San Francisco to the metropolis of New York in 11 hours. We merely have to compare 11 days with 11 hours.

Captain Patterson continues:

But our Army is the second line, and it is conceivable that some day, somehow, we might be forced back on that second line.

Perhaps, Mr. President; but if we are successful in forging a chain of steel around the portion of the western hemisphere in which we are interested, if America ever becomes involved in a war, regardless of the strength of her enemies, there will never be an opportunity for her enemies to penetrate that steel band and thereby attack the Army, which Captain Patterson sees fit to declare is our second line of defense.

In passing, Mr. President, I remind the Members of this body that recently I introduced a joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to enter into negotiations with the Governments of France and Great Britain with a view to acquiring certain island possessions in the Caribbean and in the North Atlantic, in the form of outposts, which outposts would serve as links in the steel chain with which I think we should encircle the northern portion of the Western Hemisphere, so that if we are ever drawn into a conflict due to no fault of ours, all the fighting will take place outside continental United States, thereby guaranteeing that not one drop of blood will ever be shed upon the soil of the United States of America.

In speaking of welding a chain of steel around the portion of the Western Hemisphere in which we are interested, I have in mind first the protection of the Panama Canal. I speak of it particularly at this hour for the reason that at this session, only a few weeks ago, an appropriation of $15,000,000 was made for the purpose of beginning surveys and starting upon a third set of locks in the Canal Zone, which will cost the taxpayers of this country $300,000,000 in addition to the millions we have already expended in order that our Navy may continue to be a two-ocean Navy. In order further to protect and safeguard the Canal, I have suggested that we make peaceful acquisition of Trinidad, which is just off the coast of Venezuela, and of the islands of Great Britain and France in the Leeward and Windward groups and northward, taking in Bimini and Nassau, Jamaica and Bermuda, the latter of which would provide us with our only outpost on the north.

Proceeding northward, Mr. President, I am pleased at this time to have the opportunity of making mention of the fact that within recent weeks many people of America have become unduly excited in reference to the location of Greenland and Iceland. Many have said that now perhaps there might be a transfer of these island possessions for one reason or cause or another to some other power, and that we might be subject to attack from them. Of course, anyone who will look at the map of the world will see that Greenland, as a matter of fact, is several thousand miles away from the port of New York, and that Iceland itself is about 3,000 miles away from New York. However, I wish to say to those who have become excited that if we are successful under my resolution in acquiring island possessions of the French, we will have taken over peacefully the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, which are located only a few miles from the coast of Newfoundland, and there, if necessary, we could establish air bases, and, if necessary, naval bases to meet any attack which might come from Greenland or Iceland or from the northeast.

In addition to that, Mr. President, I have suggested the acquisition of the islands mentioned by our President, those belonging to the Republic of Colombia just south of Ecuador, and, to follow his suggestion, it would be well, I think, to endeavor to secure the Cocos Islands, a group belonging to the Republic of Costa Rico. Further north, in welding this steel chain around the United States, I think that now, when we are considering the national defense, we should endeavor by peaceful negotiation to secure from our sister republic to the south, Mexico, the peninsula of Lower California, which belongs to that Government, in order that we might be assured that no air bases of an enemy nation would ever be established in Lower California; and in addition thereto, in order that no enemy battleships, cruisers, or submarines could find a haven and place of security on the ocean between the peninsula of California and the mainland of Mexico.

Of course, we all know that in the Hawaiian Islands we have Schofield Barracks, the finest fortifications in the world, and the strongest, not excepting Singapore in the Malay States.

Proceeding north, I want to say again that I was disappointed, as was my distinguished colleague from Washington, the other day, when we learned that there was stricken out an appropriation of $12,300,000 which was to have been utilized in strengthening our defenses at Sitka, Unalaska, and Dutch Harbor in the Aleutians, the westernmost of which, Attu, is only 2 hours from the territory of Japan and Russia.

If that steel band or chain were welded around the United States, no fighting would ever take place upon its borders; no American blood would ever be spilled upon our virgin soil, and no American need have any fear of any of the nations that are now weakening themselves in Europe or those that are being weakened in Asia, attacking our country, which is the most fortunately situated geographically of any country on the face of the earth.

Captain Patterson concludes his editorial by stating:

If we get into a war, it will be men of C. C. C. age who will be drafted to do most of the fighting.

To train the C. C. C.'ers in the fundamentals of warfare now would be a great kindness to them as well as a first-class piece of war-risk insurance for ourselves.

I am in thorough accord with that statement of Captain Patterson, because I think that we would not be discriminating against them, but we would be preparing them and providing them with a better opportunity to secure commissions and become officers than the sons of the rich who have not had the opportunity of rubbing shoulders with their brother Americans in the C. C. C. camps. As Captain Patterson says:

The talk about such training being discrimination against poor boys and in favor of rich boys is close to tops in bunk. If and when the draft takes all the young men, rich and poor, the C. C. C. boys who have shown up well in their training will get the noncom jobs and boss the completely raw recruits around.

We ought to toss the sentimentalists and sob sisters over the side as regards the C. C. C. and institute military training in the outfit right away.

He concludes by saying:

And while we're making the makings of a quickly expandible army—two ships for one.

I ask that the newspaper clipping which I sent to the desk may be inserted in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEFENSE LOOPHOLES

(By Raymond Clapper)

One glaring hole is left wide open in our defense preparations and it needs immediate attention.

We are neglecting to lay in adequate stocks of rubber and tin.

These two commodities, essential alike for military and civilian needs, must be imported from across the Pacific, from the Dutch and British East Indies, at which Japan is looking hungrily. We might as well neglect to lay in an adequate supply of battleships and airplane factories, for they are no more vital than the materials which are as basic to our industry as rubber and tin.

It is elementary that our national defense requires protection with regard to these supplies. And it also is elementary that if anything should happen in the Far East to cut off our supply of rubber and tin, we should, at best, be quite some little time in reopening that traffic route.

Yet, in face of that situation, we have on hand in this country just about enough rubber to last us 3 months. We have just about enough tin to last us 10 weeks.

It is not that the State Department is asleep. For 3 years it has been trying to get action. It has tried, with practically no success, to induce private industry to lay in heavy reserve stocks. And it has been trying, with very little more success, to induce Congress to buy up reserve stocks. Yet we are still on a reserve which would last us but 3 months if our imports were suddenly interrupted.

In 1937 the State Department asked Congress for authority and money with which to lay in emergency stocks of rubber, tin, and some other strategic raw materials which are not produced in this country. Finally last summer the authorization was obtained—but the amount of money allowed was pitifully inadequate.

The Government asked for $25,000,000 a year. Last year Congress gave $10,000,000, which if spent entirely on rubber would purchase less than a month's supply.

This year, with war raging and spreading, Congress was asked to at least carry out the original schedule and appropriate $40,000,000, to compensate for last year's short-change. But Congress appropriated $12,500,000, graciously allowing $3,000,000 to be spent at once and the remainder during the fiscal year beginning next July 1.

In terms of what we are spending on other and no more essential kinds of preparedness, that is chicken feed. A few days ago the Senate passed a naval appropriation bill carrying $963,000,000. It has voted money to start a third set of locks at Panama, to cost, perhaps, $300,000,000. Probably another naval expansion to cost $650,000,000 will soon be voted. The Army supply bill runs to $785,000,000, and the War Department is asking for $42,000,000 more. Yet we are content to ride along blithely on a 3-month supply of rubber and tin, beyond which we are at the mercy of the outside world.

In terms of normal consumption of rubber and tin, the inadequacy of these funds for reserve purchases is equally glaring.

Last year our tin imports cost $71,000,000. Our rubber imports cost $178,000,000, and the price was low—the same quantity now would cost about $230,000,000. Yet Congress allows $12,500,000 for building up reserves of all strategic materials during the next year.

Recent developments abroad have intensified the Government's concern over this situation, and it is possible that Congress will be asked to reconsider and to look with more foresight at this vital phase of our national defense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, there is lying on the desk another amendment which I submitted on Friday last and which I now call up and offer at this time. That amendment is one which would provide that the joint resolution as amended would terminate on May 1, 1941. May it be stated at the desk, please?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the proper place it is proposed to insert the following:

This joint resolution, as amended, shall terminate May 1, 1941.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, this particular amendment presents no special question. In view of all the positions announced by those in charge of the joint resolution, and the grants of authority contained in the joint resolution itself, and in view particularly of the fact that it is intended to apply to the national emergency as defined by the President, if we extend the act until May 1, 1941, Congress will return in January 1941, and will have been here 4 months by May 1, 1941. It will then be able to deal with the situation then confronting it, and if a further extension of the powers of the act is then called for, we can extend it just as we did with reference to the reciprocal trade agreements program. If, however, there is no longer any such emergency, then the powers herein conferred would terminate automatically on the date mentioned. That briefly is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. I hope amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 1, after the word "credit", it is proposed to insert—

other than credits relating solely to transactions to be executed wholly within the United States.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I have sufficient sympathy with the purposes of the pending joint resolution so that I do not like to oppose it, but it seems to me that as Members of the Congress we certainly would stultify ourselves if we should vote for the joint resolution without some such amendment. No other measure, so far as I know, has proposed to delegate such completely arbitrary powers to the President of the United States to all kinds of transactions. So far as I can see, under this joint resolution he could issue tomorrow regulations which would require me to obtain a license before I could draw a check on my own bank account in any bank of the United States without any reference whatever to foreign affairs, or any reference to anything except the fact that there is a transfer of credit involved in my checking on my account in any bank in the United States.

The joint resolution, in the first place, uses the words "during time of war."

I assume that means during time of war in which the United States is engaged, although the term is ambiguous and subject to interpretation. The President might say that it meant whenever any war was going on anywhere in the world—and there nearly always is a war going on at some place—or during any other period of national emergency declared by the President.

Frankly, Mr. President, that does not mean anything. It means that at any time, under any circumstances, the President may go ahead and exercise the powers. As proof of that fact, the President actually did issue regulations under that provision of national emergency in 1934, and those regulations have been continuously in effect ever since that time. Presumably, therefore, the President considers that we have been in a perpetual state of national emergency ever since 1934. What that emergency is, I do not profess to understand, unless it is one brought about by the measures we have taken to try to restore prosperity.

The joint resolution then says in effect, therefore, that at any time the President may proceed to regulate what? First, transactions in foreign exchange; second, transfers of credit between or payments by or to banking institutions as defined by the President. That is not related to any foreign government; it is not related to any foreign transaction; it is not related to anything except transfers of credit between banking institutions or payments by banking institutions, which covers every single payment on every check which may be drawn in the United States.

Originally, when this act was passed during the war, the words which I seek to insert by the pending amendment were in the act. They did specifically exempt transactions which were entirely within the United States and entirely completed within the United States. That was at least some limitation. Congress felt that even in time of war we ought to have that limitation, and ought not to try to confer such broad powers. If there is no war, it certainly seems that those words should be inserted, so that at least this measure may be confined to foreign transactions.

The new words which are proposed to be inserted in the law prohibit, without license, any transfer, withdrawal, or exportation of, or dealing in, any evidence of indebtedness or evidence of ownership of property in which any foreign state or a national or political subdivision thereof has any interest. That means that because there is a war in Europe the President may prohibit any citizen of the Argentine, say, from transferring any bank account in the United States or drawing any check in the United States. Of course, it is said that the President is not going to exercise those powers; but if he is not going to exercise them, then we should not grant him the powers. We have on the books a long series of statutes giving to the President various kinds of emergency powers. The time has come when Congress should assume its own function of legislation, when it should not delegate to the President arbitrary power; and after this amendment shall have been disposed of I propose to offer another amendment providing that this power shall apply only to any foreign state which the President finds to be involved in actual warfare.

A much more far-reaching principle is involved here than the question of whether we are going to prohibit credits for Norway and Denmark. It seems to me this legislation could have been so drawn as simply to give the President the powers he may actually have to exercise in real emergencies between now and the time Congress returns. I can see no reason why we should give the President power to regulate by license, if he sees fit to do so, without further action by Congress, every transfer of every bank account of any individual in the United States.

I cannot understand from the author of the joint resolution what possible objection there can be to inserting in it these words, which were in the law for a long time. They were taken out, as I understand, in order that the President might have during the bank emergency the extraordinary power to close the banks; and the proof that this measure does apply to domestic transactions is that this is the statute, and the words "transfers of credit between or payments by or to banking institutions as defined by the President" are the words under which the President of the United States closed every bank in the United States and forbade any bank to pay any check that any individual might draw.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The arguments which have been made as to the changes proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] apply with equal force to that now proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Danaher	King	Sheppard
Ashurst	Donahey	La Follette	Shipstead
Austin	Downey	Lodge	Slattery
Bailey	Ellender	Lucas	Smathers
Bankhead	Frazier	Lundeen	Smith
Barbour	George	McKellar	Stewart
Barkley	Gerry	McNary	Taft
Bilbo	Gillette	Maloney	Thomas, Idaho
Bone	Glass	Mead	Thomas, Okla.
Bridges	Guffey	Miller	Thomas, Utah
Brown	Gurney	Minton	Tobey
Bulow	Hale	Murray	Townsend
Burke	Harrison	Norris	Truman
Byrd	Hatch	O'Mahoney	Tydings
Capper	Hayden	Overton	Vandenberg
Caraway	Herring	Pittman	Van Nuys
Chandler	Hill	Reed	Wagner
Chavez	Holman	Reynolds	Walsh
Clark, Idaho	Hughes	Russell	Wheeler
Clark, Mo.	Johnson, Calif.	Schwartz	White
Connally	Johnson, Colo.	Schwellenbach	Wiley

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert on page 2, line 6, after the word "state", the words "which the President finds to be involved in actual warfare."

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is to confine the operations of the act to those nations which are in some way involved in war, or the nationals of such countries, and not give the President power to limit transactions which may be related to Argentina or any other South American country, or any other country throughout the world.

I have made the language somewhat broader than that of the neutrality act, making it apply to any foreign state "which the President finds to be involved in actual warfare." I think that would cover Denmark and Norway, as well as other nations. Denmark is certainly now involved in the World War, having been invaded by the German Army, and being administered by the German Army. I see no reason why the contemplated powers should be granted regarding securities of Argentine citizens, for instance, so that such a citizen living in this country would be subject to any kind of regulation.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. It would actually exclude Denmark altogether, because they are not involved in any war at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 252) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7737) to amend the Judicial Code by adding a new section thereto, designated as section 266a, to provide for intervention by States in certain cases involving the validity of the exercise of any power by the United States, or any agency thereof, or any officer or employee thereof, and for other purposes; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. SUMNERS of Texas, Mr. WALTER, Mr. SATTERFIELD, Mr. GUYER of Kansas, and Mr. GWYNNE were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

THE TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1374, Senate bill 2925, to amend the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2925) to amend the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the first amendment of the committee.

The first amendment of the committee was on page 1, line 10, after the word "States", to insert the words "and the counties therein."

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, this is the particular amendment which led to the discussion a few days ago between the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and me. As a result of the bill having been called up from the calendar on April 12, as I recall, I wrote to the Tennessee Valley Authority and asked them to submit to me certain information. I think the information I then asked for might be put before the Senate in preliminary form by having the RECORD show the questions I asked. I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD a copy of my letter of April 12, directed to the Tennessee Valley Authority.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 12, 1940.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY,
Woodward Building, 1426 H Street NW., Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Of course, you are familiar with the pending Senate bill 2925, which would amend section 13 of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933. Equally, I am sure, you will appreciate that extending the act to include not only the States but "the counties therein" marks a departure from the principle upon which the original act was written. It may well be that this bill should pass, but there certainly must be a great many factors to be considered not readily apparent from either the bill or the committee report. In the report we read: "The experts representing the various localities and States and the experts of the Tennessee Valley Authority have worked out a solution, however, which is satisfactory to all parties concerned * * *."

I would like very much to have information:

(1) As to the value of the lands in the affected counties which has been taken by the Tennessee Valley Authority.

(2) The value of buildings and structures thereon which has now been taken out of the ratable property lists of the affected counties.

(3) The amount of taxes lost by each of the counties, if you have that information so itemized; and if not, the total of the taxes lost by the affected counties.

(4) The amounts in dollars paid for the lands within each of the affected counties taken for use by the Tennessee Valley Authority.

(5) The increase in value of properties within each of the States affected as a result of our construction under the Tennessee Valley Authority.

(6) If possible, an estimate of the increase in the value of the properties contiguous to the Tennessee Valley Authority and served by it.

(7) An estimate, by States, of the value of the advantages to the respective States by virtue of the presence of the Tennessee Valley Authority operations.

I assume that the foregoing or substantially similar information must have been available to you in the course of your consideration of the problems upon which the committee reports an agreement has been reached. I would greatly appreciate the courtesy of your writing me as fully as you choose at the earliest convenient opportunity, that I may have the information at hand in giving proper consideration to this bill.

Please believe me with appreciation,

Faithfully yours.

Mr. DANAHER. In reply to that particular letter of inquiry, I received a letter from the Tennessee Valley Authority under date of April 23.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Before the vote was taken on the joint resolution which was passed a few moments ago a number of the Members of the Senate were compelled to leave the Chamber, and expressed the desire that the bill now pending should go over until tomorrow. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who is in charge of the bill, has acquiesced in the suggestion. I wonder whether the Senator from Connecticut, in view of that situation, would prefer to make his remarks now or wait until we resume the consideration of the bill tomorrow.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I acquiesce thoroughly in the purpose of the Senator from Kentucky to have the matter go over until tomorrow, but I believe that, having submitted my letter of inquiry of April 12, I should complete the record, so that the Members of the Senate will have before them the answer I received and the tables supplied to me by the T. V. A. I think the information therein contained will facilitate understanding and consideration of the matter in due course.

It will also be noted that the T. V. A. state in their letter to me that certain data will be in my hands before May 1; and since that means tomorrow, I think it is apropos that the matter go over until we receive those data.

I ask unanimous consent that the response of the T. V. A. to my letter of April 12, with the appended tables, be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY,
Knoxville, Tenn., April 23, 1940.

The Honorable JOHN A. DANAHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR DANAHER: Your request of April 12 addressed to our Washington office has been referred to me for reply. Our response has been delayed in order to send with it as much as possible of the material in the form required by the terms of your inquiry. A substantial volume of data has already been assembled, analyzed, and submitted to the Congress, to which reference is made in this letter.

Much of this material has been reexamined and has resulted in its reclassification for the purposes of items 1, 2, and 3. Data relating to former assessed values and taxes on real-estate and electric-utility properties acquired by the Authority, by counties, are enclosed herewith in the form of tables I to V, inclusive. Improvements and land are typically consolidated for assessment in the affected areas, consequently separate valuations for buildings and structures are not available. It should be pointed out that data for land being acquired for the Kentucky and Watts Bar Dam projects, under construction, are not included in the tabulations, since only rough preliminary estimates are available for these projects at this time. Final land-purchase lines have not yet been established for these two reservoirs.

Item 4: The Authority's data on the purchase price of land and electric-utility properties have been compiled by projects. For example, accounts and records with respect to land are established in terms of an entire reservoir area; similarly, electric-utility properties are recorded in terms of the company systems in the purchase units as acquired. Your request for a break-down of this same material by counties necessitates a new tabulation. These data will be in your hands before May 1.

Items 5 and 6: Unfortunately it is not possible to respond to these questions in any degree of reliable precision. Insofar as these questions can be illuminated by assessment data, material is available in the hearings * * * on the independent offices appropriation bill for 1941 before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations, part 2, pages 1735–1745.

Item 7: This question is covered in the same volume, beginning at page 1745, through page 1751.

Very truly yours,

GORDON R. CLAPP,
General Manager.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in view of the situation to which I have referred, I think we might suspend the consideration of legislative business at this point. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. HUGHES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of James P. Leamy, of Vermont, to be United States district judge for the district of Vermont, vice Harland B. Howe, retired.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of A. Miles Pratt, of New Orleans, La., to be collector of customs for customs collection district numbered 20, with headquarters at New Orleans, La. (reappointment).

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters will be confirmed en bloc. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Army be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Army nominations are confirmed en bloc. That concludes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, April 30, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, APRIL 29, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAYBURN].

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, we pray Thee to enter more abundantly into our hearts, that we may have deeper love, and broader sympathies for our fellow men. Marvelous things are spoken of Thee, O God of our earthly Zion. In the deepest recesses of our breasts may we know that Thou art our Father upon earth, full of grace and truth. We thank Thee for this day of happy springtime. The orchards are budding, the fields are promising, the flowers are blooming, the birds are singing, the waters are rippling, and on upland and lowland the sunlight is smiling, and promise is everywhere. O lead us to consecrate the glory and the beauty of this day to Thee; open our eyes that it may be a fresh disclosure of the Infinite God, whose master hand is over all. Bless our spirits; deeper than we have known, clearer than we have seen, light the flames of divine love on the altars of all hearts. Enable us to pursue our labors with understanding, patience, self-restraint, and soften every impulse by reflection. In our Saviour's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, April 26, 1940, was read and approved.

AMENDMENT OF THE JUDICIAL CODE

Mr. SATTERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7737) to amend the judicial code by adding a new section thereto, designated as section 266a, to provide for intervention by States in certain cases involving the validity of the exercise of any power by the United States, or any agency thereof, or any officer or employee thereof, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference with the Senate and the appointment of conferees.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.]

The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. SUMNERS of Texas, WALTER, SATTERFIELD, GUYER of Kansas, and GWYNNE.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a statement issued by Colonel Harrington.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and I further ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks a brief newspaper article.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, with so much agitation taking place regarding sugar legislation, I feel that it is important for this body to know the position respecting same as taken by each area, and I take the liberty of inserting at this point a press dispatch which appeared in the New York Journal of Commerce on April 26, 1940:

[From the Journal of Commerce, April 26, 1940]

OPPOSE EXTENSION OF 1937 SUGAR ACT

NEW ORLEANS, April 25.—Decision of the American Sugar Cane League to oppose extension of the present control legislation has been announced by W. F. Giles, its president, who has requested the Louisiana congressional delegation to support such a stand. The announcement of Mr. Giles said:

"At the meeting of the executive committee of the American Sugar Cane League held in New Orleans on April 24, 1940, it was unanimously agreed that the American Sugar Cane League go on record as opposing sugar legislation extending the present act, and that the Sugar Act of 1937 be permitted to expire on December 31, 1940, as outlined therein.

"This thought of the industry was put in the form of a resolution, which is being sent to the Louisiana congressional delegation through the Washington representative of the American Sugar Cane League."

Inability of the Louisiana cane growers to obtain a quota satisfactory to them, and other dissatisfaction rising from administration are understood to be the cause of the stand.

It is important to note that the American Sugar Cane League of New Orleans opposes the extension of the Sugar Act of 1937 and requests that it be allowed to expire without reenactment.

Florida takes the very same position, Mr. Speaker, and will vigorously oppose any legislation which seeks to continue the Sugar Act of 1937 or its provisions in any form or manner. [Applause.]

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. CANNON of Missouri submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 8202) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, this historic Chamber has been the setting of many a strange and unusual scene. Yet I doubt if it ever witnessed a more perfect blending of inharmonious and discordant elements than that attained when the meanest "gag" rule ever offered Congress was under discussion on this floor last week.

As reported by the Rules Committee, that rule put to shame every other "gag" rule ever reported to this House. Its champions and defenders were forces that ordinarily lock in bitter combat day after day. But for this occasion they were ingloriously united to support a measure having for its purpose the destruction of the wage and hour law of a previous Congress.

I can bear with those on the left whose constituencies comprise so many thousands of the Negro race. I know something of their problems. But I cannot salute those on the other side. They are the spokesmen of the Republican Party, whose citadel is the northern part of the United States. They stood shoulder to shoulder in that discussion with the representatives of cheap labor in the South—10-cents-an-hour labor. They applauded the utterances of the sage of Camilla, Ga., in his assault on a measure whose only purpose for being is a guaranty that working men and women of America shall receive not less than 30 cents an hour for their labor.

Those gentlemen from the northern Republican districts were strong, for the moment, in their support of the gentleman from Georgia. They applauded his words, laughed at his quips, and cheered in derision when he belittled the spokesmen of large centers of population. Yet how many of those northern Republicans would go before their own constituents and make a fight on a minimum wage of 30 cents an hour? Not one, Mr. Speaker; not one would do at home what so many of their members so openly did here—away from home—in lavishing approval by applause, laughter, and derision on the un-American standards of living the gentleman from Georgia apparently advocates.

Politics make strange bedfellows, and of all the strange bedfellows that ever got together between the sheets the strangest were those who climbed into the same bed last week—the northern Republicans and the cheap-labor advocates from the South. They proved the truth of the ancient adage. Not only that—they gave a striking demonstration of the historic fact that when the Republicans are out of power they will stoop to anything whatever to get back in.

I respect those men from the South who took their stand, mistaken though I believe it to be, because of the unhappy race question in their districts. They at least had home reasons to support them. But for their opportunist Republican bedfellows I hold not a shred of respect.

Northern Republicans have no fight against a 30-cent minimum wage. They would not dare make such a fight in their own districts. They were not inspired in their stand last week by the merits of the issue. They were inspired by politics alone; by an ignoble impulse to do anything and everything within their power to deride and belittle the policies of this administration, even to paying a laborer a minimum of $12.60 a week.

In the private conduct of their own affairs I cannot bring myself to believe they would stoop to such a practice. They would not dare face their own neighbors on such an issue. Yet when they saw the chance last week to embrace such an issue, their eyes shone with hope that by doing so they would discredit this administration in some degree. And they leaned over backward in precipitate haste to embrace it. They saw their political opportunity, and, forgetting justice and fairness, they greedily grasped it.

That was on Thursday. On Friday their hero of the hour, the gentleman from Camilla, Ga., sought leave to correct the RECORD of the day before. The parliamentary situation made a vote necessary. Where on Friday were the gentleman's political supporters of Thursday? Those who had applauded his words and laughed so loudly at his quips on Thursday—did they rally around him when he wanted to correct the RECORD on Friday?

Did the northern Republicans stand up for the gentleman from Georgia then? No; not one of them. They gave lip service but not a vote. They gave him no help whatever. The gentleman from Georgia was able to correct the RECORD only through the grace of 133 Democrats of all shades and persuasion who stood up to permit him to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I pray that Almighty God will save our Nation from the cheap and petty partisanship displayed by so many members of the Republican Party last week. Its slogan, written on the record then, is this: "We will do anything—yes, anything—to get back to power again. Our eyes are on the Presidential election next November, and we will join anybody and fight for anything under the sun that will help us to win it."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

THE LATE A. FRANK LEVER

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I requested this time for the purpose of announcing to the House the death of a very distinguished South Carolinian. This beloved citizen of my State was elected to the lower House of Congress in 1900. He served in Congress for about 18 years, resigning to accept a position on the Federal Farm Loan Board. During the Wilson administration he served as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. During all these years of service in the Congress of the United States he was able to distinguish himself in writing many good statutes, especially in the interests of agriculture. He served the old Seventh South Carolina District, largely now the Second South Carolina District, which I have the honor to represent. This beloved and distinguished citizen of whom I am speaking is the Honorable A. Frank Lever, of South Carolina.

FUNERAL RITES FOR THE FORMER CONGRESSMAN, WHO WAS AN OUTSTANDING AGRICULTURAL LEADER, WILL BE HELD TUESDAY AFTERNOON

Funeral services for Asbury Francis Lever, 65, Director of Public Relations, Farm Credit Administration, former Congressman, and a national leader in the cause of agriculture, who died suddenly early Sunday morning at his home, Seven Oaks, 7 miles from Columbia, in Lexington County, will be conducted at 11 o'clock Tuesday morning from St. Paul's Lutheran Church, Lexington County.

Interment will follow at 3:30 Tuesday afternoon at Clemson College, where the cadets will form an escort from the gate to the cemetery. Six cadets will be pallbearers.

NATIVE OF LEXINGTON

The son of the late Asbury Francis Washington Lever and Mary Elvira Derrick Lever, he was born January 5, 1875, near Spring Hill, in Lexington County, and was married July 5, 1911, to Miss Lucile Butler, of Lexington. Mrs. Lever survives, as do two children, a daughter, Mary Catherine, now Mrs. James P. Mozingo, 3d, of Darlington, and a son, Asbury Francis Lever, Jr. Also one grandson, James Pierce Mozingo, 4th.

Mr. Lever was educated in the country school, and graduated from Newberry College with the honors of his class in 1895. Like most young graduates of that time, he taught for several years, and in 1897 was appointed private secretary to the late Congressman J. William Stokes, who represented the old Seventh Congressional District.

During his service with Congressman Stokes he studied law at Georgetown University, and was graduated from that institution with a degree of bachelor of laws in 1899.

In 1900 he was elected a member of the house of representatives from Lexington County. In the meantime he maintained his secretarial relationship to Congressman Stokes, who, after a prolonged illness, died in the summer of 1901.

ELECTED TO CONGRESS

Mr. Lever made the race for the unexpired term along with four other strong men in the district, among them being the present Senator E. D. SMITH. The second race was made between Thomas F. Brantley, at the time State senator from Orangeburg, and in the run-off Mr. Lever was elected. He served for 18 years in Congress, during which time he had opposition for reelection only twice and each time he defeated his opposition by an overwhelming majority.

Having been born and reared upon the farm, and having the farmers' viewpoint, he sought service upon the Agricultural Committee of the House of Representatives, and in 1902 was appointed upon this committee, where he served during his entire membership in the House. He became an active and influential member of that committee and was regarded by his colleagues as a progressive, and sound thinker.

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN

When the Democrats gained control of Congress, Mr. Lever became chairman of the powerful Agriculture Committee and directed its policies during the entire Wilson administration.

As chairman of the committee, he successfully engineered the fight for the passage of the act creating the agricultural extension work for the Nation. He was a strong friend and admirer and in a way a disciple of the famous Dr. Seaman A. Knapp, out of whose fertile brain came the ideals underlying the present Extension Service.

Mr. Lever's contribution to that great work lies in the fact that he consolidated the friends of the work and put them squarely behind the proposition to make it by law a permanent part of the agricultural educational system of the country. The ups and downs of this fight, the heartaches and disappointments connected with it, and the ultimate victory marked by Mr. Lever as foremost in the rank of agricultural statesmanship of that period.

The Smith-Lever Act, as it became known, Senator Hoke Smith, of Georgia, being a coauthor, although it is well known that the real work was done by Mr. Lever, is his most notable contribution to the legislation of the Nation.

CONCEIVED WAREHOUSE SYSTEM

Mr. Lever also conceived the idea of the Federal warehouse system, through which it was his hope that the Federal warehouse certificate would give liquidity to farm products stored in federally licensed warehouses. There has been a gradual growth in the system of Federal warehouses, and the thought in Mr. Lever's mind when he wrote the act is each day more and more bearing good fruit for agriculture.

With Senator E. D. SMITH, of South Carolina, he was the coauthor of the Cotton Futures Act, which was the first successful legislation attempted on a national scale to regulate the operations of cotton-futures exchanges in this country. The act has been in operation for many years without substantial amendments, and no doubt has been a vast benefit to the cotton farmers, who had been, prior to its passage, victims of the unrestrained, selfish operations of these institutions.

The Grain Futures Act, passed more recently by Congress, is the legitimate offspring of the Cotton Futures Act. The fight for the enactment of the law was long-drawn-out and bitter. Many attempts had been made to regulate by law these institutions in prior Congresses, but none had been successful.

FOR RURAL CREDIT

Mr. Lever, early in his career in Congress, conceived the idea that the farmers of the country were entitled to a system of rural credits analogous, as far as possible, to some of the then successful systems in operation in European countries. He was one of the pioneers in the movement in this direction and was a member of the joint committee of the House and Senate which formulated the groundwork for the enactment of the Federal Farm Loan Act of 1916, out of which has grown the present Farm Credit Administration, with its Federal land bank, with its Federal intermediate credit bank, with its bank for cooperatives, and with its Production Credit Corporation and production credit associations, furnishing, for the first time a complete, coordinated, farmer-managed and farmer-owned rural credit system.

FOR FARM CREDIT

It is said that Mr. Lever at the annual convention of the Farm Bureau Federation in Indianapolis, about 1920, delivered a most striking address in which he visioned and visualized what has given the Production Credit Corporations and the intermediate credit banks to the Nation.

At this meeting a rising vote of a vast audience of more than 8,000 delegates gave approval of the suggestion that Mr. Lever was the grandfather of American agricultural legislation. He was the author, also, of many other notable legislative enactments in behalf of agriculture during his services as chairman of the Agricultural Committee.

In 1910, the University of Maryland conferred the degree of doctor of laws upon Mr. Lever "because of his services to education and agriculture."

ON THE FARM LOAN BOARD

At the personal request of President Wilson, Mr. Lever resigned from Congress in 1919 to become a member of the Federal Farm Loan Board, which had directing charge of the Farm Loan Act. In that capacity he contributed much in laying the foundations for the growth of the Federal land-bank system in this country.

Throughout his career in Congress and on the Farm Loan Board it was said of him that his sympathies were always with the little farmer, and that it was not unreasonable, because he himself was a product of the small farm.

He organized the first joint-stock land bank south of the Potomac River and east of the Mississippi River and built it into one of the most powerful farm-mortgage institutions in the South. For several years, by special request, he served as a field representative of the old Farm Loan Board, and was at the time of his death director of public relations for the Farm Credit Administration of Columbia, having been the first man appointed in the personnel of that institution when it was established in Columbia in the summer of 1933.

In 1937 Newberry College conferred upon him the degree of doctor of laws; in 1937 Clemson College conferred upon him the degree of social science; in 1935 he was made an honorary member of the Epsilon Sigma Phi honorary extension fraternity at its meeting in Washington and by this same fraternity was recently conferred the distinguished-service Ruby, its highest award.

Mr. Lever's principal objective in life, and to which he devoted practically all of his life's work, was to bring about a richer rural life for the Nation.

His own words at a recent conference of agricultural workers were:

"I have always felt that so long as the country home was safe and sound in its thinking the country itself was safe in its future, and it is to the country women that we must look for that same philosophy of life and that guidance along right lines that shall continue to make our country people the sheet anchor of the safety of our civilization in times of stress and storm."

Mr. Lever lived on the farm and was tremendously interested in all of the farm problems that arose from time to time. Mr. Lever had the reputation of being a very powerful and persuasive speaker before farm audiences.

Mr. Lever was deeply interested in the State fair and for many years was a vice president.

CLEMSON, NEWBERRY TRUSTEE

He was a life trustee of Clemson College, chairman of the board of trustees of Newberry College, a lifelong member of the Lutheran Church, and took a prominent part in religious, educational, and civic affairs.

Early in 1940 he accepted from former President Herbert Hoover the State directorship for the Finnish relief fund in South Carolina. His outstanding efforts met with a successful response in this State.

Last January he ably served as chairman of the bicentennial celebration for Lexington County, his forefathers having been among the very first settlers in Lexington County.

HONORARY PALLBEARERS

Honorary pallbearers for Mr. Lever's funeral will be: Dr. E. W. Sikes, president of Clemson College, and the following members of the board of trustees: W. W. Bradley, J. E. Sirrine, Paul Sanders, Christie Benet, T. B. Young, R. M. Cooper, W. Clyde Graham, Edgar A. Brown, Sam H. Sherard, Joe B. Douthit, F. E. Cope, and W. D. Barnett; also Dr. James C. Kinard, president of Newberry College, and trustees of Newberry College, Dr. L. E. Madden, Dr. William Weston, Sr., Judge Alva M. Lumpkin, J. Waties Thomas, Col. R. M. Barnes, B. M. Edwards, Julian H. Scarborough, Joseph E. Cagle, Rufus R. Clark, Samuel C. Lattimore, E. A. Stubbs, C. D. Orrell, Judge Harry D. Reed, E. P. Sanders, Frank P. McGowan, Henry S. Johnson, H. P. Heath, George D. Halsey, M. A. Brooker, Harold C. Booker, George L. Griffeth, A. H. Stevens, H. E. Bailey, Gov. Burnet R. Maybank, Senator James F. Byrnes, D. D. Witcover, Paul Moore, Judge Cecil Wyche, I. C. Harrison, Eugene S. Blease, Senator A. L. Harmon, Cole. L. Blease, Dr. P. H. Shealy, C. E. Leaphart, Chalmers E. Wessinger, Marion B. Holman, and L. K. Bachman.

Active pallbearers in Columbia will be Quay D. Williford, T. S. Means, J. P. Mozingo, 3d, John Smith, George Lever, and J. Kess Derrick.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a brief statement by me on House Resolution 289 on April 25 with reference to the same subject, which I inadvertently left out of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the policy adopted some few months ago, the gentleman cannot extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD, but he can extend them in the Appendix.

Without objection, the gentleman may extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial from the St. Louis County Watchman-Advocate of April 26, 1940.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARTER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the fourth reorganization plan of the President.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and therein to include an editorial on our neutrality program, from the St. Louis Star-Times.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a speech of Henry A. Wallace, delivered Saturday at St. Paul. This is a little more than the two-page allotment and I ask special permission, Mr. Speaker, that it may all be put in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein some resolutions adopted by the Western Association of State Highway Officials.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a statement which I made before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the public defender system.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a resolution passed by the Western Pennsylvania Business Association concerning the St. Lawrence seaway project.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a resolution adopted by the United Irish-American Societies of New York at a meeting held on April 24, 1940.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

SPENDING UNPARALLELED IN HISTORY

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Members of Congress, going, going, going, and we will soon be gone.

If you will notice the Treasury statement for April 24, you will see that we are $3,144,141,411.48 in the red. Think of it. One hundred and forty-four million dollars above the $3,000,000,000 mark since July 1, 1939. It is terrible—such spending. When this session of the Congress began January 3 it was generally understood that we were going to be for economy. It was expected by the country that we would stop ruthless spending of the taxpayers' money. The Senate now is trying to increase all the appropriation bills the House has passed, and we passed nothing but appropriations for the first 3 months of this session. What are the children of the oncoming generations going to do when we are unable to meet our obligations today and pass the burden on to them? We are passing this debt on to our children because this administration has no program to meet the expense. Where are you going to get the money or where are they going to get the money? That is the question. None of you have been able to answer. The only way we can clean them out is to get Members of Congress who will economize. It will require a new President, a majority of the Senate, and a majority of the Members of the House of Representatives who have some knowledge of business, a Congress who has the ability to diagnose the ills of the laws passed. A Congress who will take the Government out of business that is competing against private enterprise and putting them out of business. A Congress who will give liberty and independence to its people to work out jobs for 9,000,000 people, put them in industry and agriculture, where they have jobs, and in that way take them off the W. P. A. and P. W. A., and get them off the Government pay roll onto the pay roll of private business and agriculture. We need to stop Government red tape, Government persecution, and Government blundering by the New Deal. Instead of a Government dole, American labor wants a job in private industry. We need a Congress of practical men rather than a theoretic Congress. Theory and practice do not always work. We have tried the New Deal theory. Now let us get practical sense, make changes in laws that will give freedom to work, freedom to invest, freedom to create jobs by investing our idle private funds, stop spending so lavishly. If we do this, jobs will be created and we will have a happy people.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SCHWERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article from the Buffalo Evening News.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PER CAPITA DEBT $300; PER CAPITA WEALTH $3,000

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, regarding the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], it is true we should reduce the debt as soon as we can and as quickly as possible, and practice economy in government, but I do not go along with him that future generations are going to be so greatly burdened by reason of the present debt. Our debt today is only a small percentage of the debts of other great powers and other great nations, and considering the wealth and the per capita debt in those countries and in this country, it will not be burdensome to the future generations to inherit a debt of $300 per capita, when a person who inherits that debt will inherit $3,000 in wealth with which to pay the $300 debt. So this being true, I do not see why we have a great deal to be disturbed about at this particular time.

THE LENGTH OF SPAGHETTI

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, in this 1 minute allotted to me in the moving eons of this world I may be able to bear to you my colleagues a great message of hope. Great Homer died, Virgil passed from earthly scenes, Cato and the Caesars turned to clay without knowing how long spaghetti should be in order to be good food. Now into this chaotic scene, where over the centuries the controversy has continued concerning the span of spaghetti, we have had a decision from one of those bureaus where the act of man becomes the act of God. Mr. Speaker, this great international question has been settled by our marvelous Federal Trade Commission. Thousands of people, aye millions, from Booraboola Gha to the Aleuts, have waited with bated breath for this decision.

I insert here the Federal Trade Commission report on this most vital and attention-demanding subject of how long spaghetti should be.

The Federal Trade Commission has ruled that the length of marcaroni or spaghetti is in no way indicative of its quality.

In the case of John B. Canepa Co., 30 West Grand Avenue, Chicago, manufacturer of macaroni and spaghetti products, the Commission finds that prior to July 12, 1938, the respondent had caused booklets and other advertising matter to be distributed in the various States, containing such advertisements as: "I hate to brag, but only the finest spaghetti is made long." Since that time the advertisements have been modified to "I hate to brag, but genuine macaroni is made long," and "I hate to brag, but genuine spaghetti is made long."

The Commission finds that such statements and representations are misleading and unfair, and that in fact genuine macaroni and spaghetti products of the finest quality are made in both long and short lengths, and that macaroni and spaghetti of the finest quality are in some instances first made in long lengths and thereafter cut into short lengths, the length being no criterion of the quality of the product.

The respondent corporation is ordered to cease and desist from further representing that the length in which macaroni or spaghetti products are manufactured or sold by the respondent or any of its competitors is in any way indicative of the genuineness or quality of such products.

O Mr. Speaker, this is epical as well as epochal. Can you, with your magnificent background of sun and prairie, picture the disastrous effect on Hereford cattle and on durum wheat growers of the Dakotas if the Federal Trade Commission, after months of deep deliberation, delving into historical tomes and the chronicles of Froissart and foods for a starving world, had decided that spaghetti, in order to be edible, should be 20 inches long? God save Mussolini.

I hold that in all the work of this Government, so busy employing useless lawyers and enlisting peanut politicians in the army of assault on the November polls, nothing has come out of one of these tin-can bureaus so valuable, so international in its significance, or so far reaching in its implications as this spaghetti ruling.

May I humbly suggest that the emblem of the third term is a coat of arms with spaghetti couchant and macaroni rampant? [Laughter.]

LEGAL LOBBYING

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I have just dropped into the hopper a House resolution calling for an investigation of departments and bureaus which use unlawful methods in seeking to influence pending legislation.

This time the offending agency is the Office of Government Reports, which is attached to the Executive Office.

If this piece of propaganda, which I hold in my hand, is a Government report, then I am a prima donna.

I want the RECORD to show that the document was printed at Government expense and was mailed out under franking privileges and that same constitutes one of the most flagrant examples of bureaucratic contempt and disregard of existing law.

If a whipping-post penalty could be substituted for dismissal from office, we might break these offending bureaus from sucking eggs.

ILLEGAL PROPAGANDA PRACTICES OF DEPARTMENTS AND BUREAUS

Mr. Speaker, there has from time to time in recent months been brought to the attention of this body cumulative evidence of illegal lobbying and political activity on the part of the various Government departments and the bureaucratic agencies operating under or independent of them.

This evidence, backed by documentary proof, has been so damning and conclusive in the case of the National Labor Relations Board that the Attorney General, after much backing and filling, on March 13, 1940, finally notified the gentleman from Virginia, Representative HOWARD W. SMITH, chairman of the special committee of this House investigating the National Labor Relations Board, that an investigation of the complaints as to these illegal acts and the evidence relating thereto has been undertaken by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The reluctant consent of the Attorney General to this investigation was not obtained without much prompting on the part of the chairman of the committee, who, urged to introduce new legislation in order to clarify the meaning of the United States Code, apparently obscure to the Attorney General, pointed out to him that what is needed is not clarification of the code but the enforcement of the existing law.

The evidence as to lobbying and political activity on the part of Government departments, their heads and subordinates, constituting a criminal offense, punishable by mandatory removal from office of the Government employees so engaged, together with other penalties, has by no means been confined to the National Labor Relations Board, but, according to verified charges and substantial proof, has been definitely established in the Farm Credit Administration, in the Department of the Interior, and elsewhere.

In how many other departments of the Government these practices are a part of the definite policy of their administrators or subordinates it is difficult to say, except as from day to day they are accidentally brought to light through their disclosure by outraged citizens, who resent these novel and New Deal methods intended to keep in funds and to perpetuate in power those who selfishly seek to benefit by the attempt, illegally and unduly, to influence the acts of the Congress.

I have in my hand the latest and one of the most flagrant of these disclosures.

This time it is not the National Labor Relations Board nor the Farm Credit Administration which is involved, but an hitherto new Government agency attached to the Executive Office, namely, the Office of Government Reports, for which an appropriation of $1,055,000 was recently asked in the President's Budget message.

The document I here present, illegally printed and distributed by the Office of Government Reports, mailed as official business from the office of the State director for Colorado, Denver, Colo., is the reproduction of an editorial by William Allen White in the Emporia (Kans.) Gazette, as reprinted in the Des Moines Register, of Des Moines, Iowa, of January 22, 1940.

The editorial to which I refer is a defense of the Hull reciprocal trade treaties, and the obvious intent of its distribution was to influence the action of the Congress on the enactment of legislation to extend the treaties.

The envelope which I hold in my hand containing this reprint was addressed to Mr. L. R. Tyson, Jr., assistant secretary, State Planning and Water Conservation Board, Capitol Building, Cheyenne, Wyo. No postage stamp was placed on the envelope.

There is, of course, no means of knowing at this time whether or not the number of these circulars, printed and mailed at Government expense, is as great as the 630,000 letters written by Governor Black of the Farm Credit Administration, and containing a memorandum from Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, which were mailed postage free to Federal land-bank borrowers. The undoubted purpose of this communication was to cultivate support for the pending Jones-Wheeler bill. This violation of law has already been brought to the attention of the House by my colleague the gentleman from New York, Representative DANIEL A. REED, and by action of the Agricultural Committee in inviting Secretary Wallace and Governor Black to appear before it to explain what was described by Governor Black himself as action which "breaks precedents."

The question before us, it seems to me, is how much longer this body is to stand for the continued perpetration of these illegal acts by the heads and employees of Government departments who appear both unafraid and immune to prosecution, despite the clear construction and wording of the law.

The danger to Democratic processes is very great if the Congress is to be surreptitiously influenced by sentiment manufactured through the distribution of political propaganda designed to affect the deliberations of this body and the legislation enacted here, propaganda paid for by the Government itself, and circulated by those who hope to be the beneficiaries of legislation sought or legislation which it is hoped to kill.

These methods are in no sense dissimilar to those employed in the European dictatorships, under which there is a ceaseless flow of propaganda emanating from the Government bureaus and having for its purpose the further entrenchment in power of the bureaucrats, big and little, who infest them.

Here, then, is a situation of ominous portent to the future freedom of legislative deliberation and action. The New Deal administration, no longer sure of the enactment of "must" measures emanating from the White House, faced with increasing scrutiny and question of its recommendations for continued spending and other proposals that have aroused general public protest, resorts to new methods intended to intimidate or to coerce the Congress into accepting its will, methods far more dangerous than the frontal attacks of the past.

It now seeks, by unlawful means, through its bureaucracies, to influence the public to exert the pressure upon Congress that it no longer dares to undertake openly. Aside from the illegality of the acts of these heads and employees of Government departments, even to members of the Cabinet, and to the formation of pressure groups, with the connivance of Government officials, there can be no doubt the new methods are far more subtle and far more misleading both to the public and to its Representatives in Congress than the old.

If the Congress is to continue to exercise its constitutional prerogatives, an end must be put to these practices—and speedily.

I therefore have introduced a resolution providing for the appointment of a select committee of the Members of this House to investigate these and other attempted encroachments upon the freedom and dignity of this body, and to report back to the House its findings and suggestions as to suitable remedies, both in the form of new legislation and for the proper enforcement of existing statutes, together with the effective prosecution of all those, whether of high or low official position, who violate the law.

CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 1 minute and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, last Friday I called the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that the Government has invested, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in the air lines of the Nation eleven and one-half million dollars. In view of the remarkable safety record of air-line operation, in which not a single fatality has occurred in the past 13 months, I consider this a sound investment. Likewise, I consider it to be the sacred duty of this Congress and sound business policy on the part of this Government to protect this investment as well as the millions of dollars of private capital invested in the air lines.

Defeat Reorganization Plans III and IV. Let aviation continue to have that to which it is justly entitled—separate regulation by an independent civil-aeronautics authority.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Reorganization Plans III and IV have been sent to, and are soon to be considered by, the Congress—which plans appear to upset all that has been done constructively relating to the regulation of civil aeronautics and the Government's activities relating to safety in the air—I have taken occasion today to reread what the Senate Special Committee on Safety in the Air has had to say on the subject. That is the committee which was created to investigate the accident in which Senator Cutting lost his life.

You remember the committee found the blame for that accident to lie upon the head of the Department of Commerce, and that in the Civil Aeronautics Act we took the control of aviation out of the hands of the Secretary of Commerce and his henchmen and vested it in the independent Civil Aeronautics Authority, with excellent results including the rolling up of an air-line safety record of more than 13 months without a single fatality or serious injury to any passenger, member of an airplane crew, or anybody else—a record never equaled in any form of transportation in all time.

The Reorganization Plans III and IV undo all this and will, unless we disapprove them, send aviation right back into the Department of Commerce.

I find that in the reports submitted by the special Senate committee to investigate safety in air—Senate Resolution 146, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session—the following views were expressed on the administration of aeronautics by the Department of Commerce.

In the preliminary report—Senate Report 2455, Seventy-fourth Congress, June 20, 1936—the following findings of fact were expressed on pages 22 and 23:

ORGANIZATION

(1) The general complaint coming from everyone, both in the manufacturing and operating industry and from the public generally, is that the Bureau of Air Commerce does not at this time have sufficient prestige or rank within the Department of Commerce to make for efficiency. It is pointed out that with the promulgation of the Executive order of June 10, 1933, aeronautics in the Department of Commerce was relegated to the status of a bureau.

The committee finds that such a claim is well-founded. * * * But the work in aeronautics is still in such a state of flux, that the activity should not be relegated to the status of a bureau.

(2) It is alleged that personnel and financial control is outside the Bureau and in the hands of the administrative assistant to the Secretary of Commerce, thereby embarrassing the Director and his two assistants.

We find this to be true.

(3) It is alleged that personal, promotional, and political activities, cropping up here and there, make for inefficiency.

The committee finds that this is true.

Everything that was said in that report will be true tomorrow if we permit control of aviation to go back to the Department of Commerce under these reorganization orders.

Page 24 of the same report states:

It has been alleged that good men were dismissed from the Bureau for political reasons with the advent of the new administration and at the expense of efficiency and safety. The committee definitely finds this to be a fact.

On page 29 I find:

The charge was made by witnesses before our committee that the efficiency of the Bureau of Air Commerce has been seriously impaired by politics. This charge is confirmed not alone by former Assistant Secretary Dickinson but by the testimony of two of the employees referred to in this memorandum.

In the second report, submitted March 17, 1937 (S. Rept. 185, 75th Cong.), after a year of further investigation, the Senate Committee on Safety in the Air expressed this conclusion:

Aeronautics within the Department of Commerce as it is organized today is a stepchild. There can be no intelligent planning and forethought continuously devoted to the present or future needs of civil aeronautics unless the existing administration be improved.

In the committee's third report, submitted January 5, 1938 (S. Rept. 185, pt. 2, 75th Cong.), the following recommendations were made:

On pages 1 and 2—

INDEPENDENT AUTHORITY FOR CIVIL AERONAUTICS

We recommend the immediate enactment of a compromise measure embracing all the noncontroversial points in Senator McCARRAN'S bill, S. 2, substitute of March 3, 1938, and the bill introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. LEA on March 3, 1938, known as H. R. 9738.

These bills would set up a separate independent commission, empowered to change the whole aspect of the Government toward all civil aviation. The authority would benefit the United States air transportation industry, both domestic and foreign. Your committee is of the opinion that the complexities of a new art and science would give way thereupon through orderly action to simplification, efficiency, and safety.

Under the leadership of practical aeronautical experts one centralized governmental agency would induce a closer coordination than that which scattered agencies now exhibit. A threatening disastrous insecurity of the industry would yield to stabilization. Promotion of the whole aeronautical industry would be intensified at a time when all nations are giving it first consideration.

So pressing is the need for common action proposed in both the Senate and House bills that your committee urges instant action for the safety and good of the public.

Testimony before the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee March 10, 1938, and before the Senate Committee on Commerce March 24, 1938, reveals that six executive departments after 2 months' study have recommended the passage of the House bill (H. R. 9738), which is substantially in intent, if not in detail, the same as the Senate bill (S. 2, with amendments).

The fact that different executive departments, a congressional committee chairman, and others, have yielded their position to join in a harmonious backing of an independent aeronautics authority, is stimulating and gratifying at this time. Some committees have labored hard for years on this subject of civil aeronautics, and such coordination reflects not only the importance of the Senate and House bills but a general recognition of the importance of safety in the air at this time.

Gentlemen of the House, remember what I have recited to you this afternoon are the facts brought out as a result of the crash which caused the life of Senator Cutting. The results of this investigation, as much as any other single factor, caused to be created the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Air Safety Board. The remarkable results obtained by that action speak for themselves. The tremendous increase in travel by the public has kept pace with the increase in air safety. You and I know we have to travel the air lines frequently. Let us all travel in safety. Why not let well enough alone and give the present safety record a chance to continue? After all, it is your neck and mine—and that is no "spinach."

COMMITTEE REPORT ON CERTAIN BILLS

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization may have 5 legislative days in which to file supplemental reports upon the bills H. R. 8226, 8379, and 7955.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from New Jersey makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 89]

Bolton	Folger	Mouton	Sheridan
Brown, Ohio	Gilchrist	Mundt	Smith, Va.
Burgin	Green	Murdock, Utah	Starnes, Ala.
Byron	Hill	Nelson	Steagall
Carlson	Hook	Patrick	Taylor
Carter	Jarman	Reece, Tenn.	Voorhis, Calif.
Case, S. Dak.	Jarrett	Reed, N. Y.	Weaver
Chapman	Jennings	Rogers, Okla.	Wheat
Culkin	McMillan, Clara G.	Routzohn	Whelchel
Darrow	Maas	Sandager	White, Ohio
Dies	Martin, Ill.	Schulte	Wolfenden, Pa.
Dirksen	Merritt	Shafer, Mich.
Eaton	Mitchell	Sheppard

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this roll call 379 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

REREFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 1608), to repeal the provisions of Private Law No. 347, Seventy-first Congress, pertaining to Victoria Kessel, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and include a short statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

AMENDMENTS TO FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT OF 1938

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5435), to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H. R. 5435, with Mr. PARSONS in the Chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 be, and it is hereby, amended as follows:

Section 5 is hereby amended by adding subsection (e) at the end thereof, said subsection to read as follows:

"(e) Nothwithstanding any provision of this act the Administrator may appoint a special industry committee for all industries engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce located or operating in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, or separate industry committees for particular industries so engaged, such committee or committees to be composed of residents of continental United States and of such island or islands where such industries are located or operating and to recommend in such industries or classifications therein the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 by employers engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce. In fixing the minimum wage rate or rates for such industries in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, the industry committee or committees and the Administrator shall be subject to the provisions of section 8 and such committee or committees shall not recommend, nor shall the Administrator approve, a minimum wage rate for such industries which will give them a competitive advantage over industries situated in continental United States.

"Hereafter only such minimum wage orders as are issued by the Administrator pursuant to the recommendations of a special industry committee as provided for in section 5 (e) shall be applicable to industries located or operating in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands; and all minimum wage orders heretofore issued by the Administrator shall be inapplicable to the industries of such islands upon the approval of this act."

Mr. BLAND (interrupting the reading of the first section). Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. I understand there are three bills, and I would like to know what bill will be read first and open for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the rule provided for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5435. That is the bill that is now being read by the Clerk.

Mr. BLAND. Is that to be considered before amendments that are to be offered to the Barden bill?

The CHAIRMAN. After the reading of the first section, of course the bill will be open to amendment.

Mr. BLAND. That is, the Norton bill will be open to amendment after the first section is read?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. BLAND. Then is the Barden bill to be offered as an amendment, and will it be considered as a whole amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. After the reading of the first section, the Chair will state, the rule provided it should be in order to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the text of the bill H. R. 7349, known as the Ramspeck bill.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. It is my understanding that the Ramspeck bill is not to be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot answer that inquiry. The Clerk will read.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TERRY. Will the Norton bill be subject to amendment as soon as it is read and before a motion to substitute either the Ramspeck bill or the Barden bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Only after the substitute will have been considered, which will be in order after the first section of H. R. 5435 is read.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does anyone desire to offer the amendment provided for under the rule, the text of the bill H. R. 7349?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: On page 1, after line 3, strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the provisions of H. R. 7349, as follows:

"That (a) section 5 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(e) No industry committee appointed under subsection (a) of this section shall have any power to recommend the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to any employees in Puerto Rico or in the Virgin Islands. Notwithstanding any other provision of this act, the Administrator may appoint a special industry committee to recommend the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to all employees (not exempted therefrom by the provisions of section 13 (a)) in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, or in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, or the Administrator may appoint separate industry committees to recommend the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to employees (not exempted therefrom by the provisions of section 13 (a)) therein engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce in particular industries. An industry committee appointed under this subsection shall be composed of residents of such island or islands where the employees with respect to whom such committee was appointed are employed and residents of the United States outside of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. In determining the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid, and in determining classifications, such industry committees and the Administrator shall be subject to the provisions of section 8 and no such committee shall recommend, nor shall the Administrator approve, a minimum wage rate which will give any industry in Puerto Rico or in the Virgin Islands a competitive advantage over any industry in the United States outside of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.'

"(b) No wage orders issued by the Administrator under section 8 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 pursuant to the recommendations of an industry committee made prior to the enactment of this act shall after such enactment be applicable with respect to any employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands.

"SEC. 2. Section 6 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(c) The provisions of paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (a) of this section shall be superseded in the case of any employee in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce only for so long as and insofar as such employee is covered by a wage order issued by the Administrator pursuant to the recommendations of a special industry committee appointed pursuant to section 5 (e).'

"SEC. 3. Section 7 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection, designated subsection (e), as follows:

"'(e) No employer shall be deemed to have violated subsection (a) by employing any employee for a workweek in excess of that specified in said subsection without paying the compensation for overtime employment prescribed therein if such employee is so employed in mining or milling of nonferrous metallic ores or operations incidental thereto, and if such employee receives compensation for employment in excess of 56 hours in any workweek at a rate of not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he has been employed.'

"SEC. 4. (a) The heading of section 11 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: '; Rules and regulations.'

"(b) Section 11 of such act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(d) The Administrator shall have power to make, issue, amend, and rescind such regulations and orders as are necessary or appropriate to carry out any of the provisions of this act. Without limiting the generality of the foregoing, such regulations and orders may define terms used in this act, make special provision with respect to, including the restriction of, home work subject to this act to the extent necessary to safeguard the minimum standards provided in this act or in any regulation or order issued pursuant thereto, and make special provision for voluntary constant wage plans consistent with the purposes of section 7. The regulations and orders of the Administrator shall be published in the Federal Register and shall be effective upon publication or at such later date as the Administrator shall direct.

"'(e) No provision of this act imposing any liability or disability shall apply to any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with any regulation or order of the Administrator, notwithstanding that such regulation or order may, after such act or omission, be amended or rescinded or be determined by judicial authority to be invalid for any reason.'

"SEC. 5. (a) Section 13 (a) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by striking out all of clause (1) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: '(1) any employee employed in a bona fide executive, administrative, professional, or local retailing capacity, or in the capacity of outside salesmen, or any employee employed at a guaranteed monthly salary of $200 or more; or.'

"(b) Section 13 (a) of such act is further amended by adding, before the period at the end thereof, the following: '; or (11) any switchboard operator, during any calendar year, employed in a public telephone exchange which at all times during the preceding calendar year had less than 500 stations.'

"SEC. 6. Section 13 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by inserting, before the period at the end thereof, the following: '; or (3) any employee of an employer subject to the provisions of part I of the Railway Labor Act.'

"SEC. 7. (a) The heading of section 14 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: '; Home work in rural areas.'

"(b) Section 14 of such act is amended (1) by inserting "(a)" after "SEC. 14."; (2) by striking out "learners, of apprentices, and of messengers employed exclusively in delivering letters and messages," and inserting in lieu thereof "learners and of apprentices,"; and (3) by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: "The Administrator may by regulation or order provide for the employment of telegraph messengers engaged primarily in the delivery of letters and messages at such wages (but not less than 25 cents per hour) lower than the minimum wage applicable under section 6 as will prevent curtailment of opportunities for such employment with a public telegraph carrier."

"(c) Section 14 of such act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(b) The Administrator shall promulgate regulations permitting the employment, in rural areas, of employees in the home at such wages lower than the minimum wage applicable under section 6 as will prevent curtailment of opportunities for employment. No such regulation shall be promulgated with respect to any employees (1) if in the opinion of the Administrator the application of section 6 to such employees does not have the effect of curtailing the opportunities of such employees for employment; (2) if the promulgation of such regulation would in the opinion of the Administrator have the effect of curtailing employment in the factories or industrial establishments, if any, in which similar work is performed; or (3) if the promulgation of such regulation would in the opinion of the Administrator give the employer or employers of such employees a substantial competitive advantage.'

"SEC. 8. Section 15 (a) (1) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by striking out the first semicolon therein and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: 'or issued to carry out any provision of section 6 or section 7, except that no provision of this act shall impose any liability upon any person for violating any of the provisions of this section if such person, in a proceeding brought to impose such liability, establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that at the time he acquired a property interest in the goods transported, offered for transportation, shipped, delivered, or sold, or sold with knowledge that shipment or delivery or sale thereof in commerce was intended, he had no knowledge or reason to believe that such goods were produced in violation of any of the provisions of section 6 or section 7, or in violation of any regulation or order of the Administrator issued under section 14, or issued to carry out any provision of section 6 or section 7; and.'

"SEC. 9. Section 15 (a) (2) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(2) to violate any of the provisions of section 6 or section 7, or any of the provisions of any regulation or order of the Administrator issued under section 14, or any of the provisions contained, pursuant to section 8 (f), in any order of the Administrator issued under section 8, or any of the provisions of any regulation or order of the Administrator issued to carry out any provision of section 6 or section 7;'.

"SEC. 10. The first sentence of section 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended to read as follows: 'Any employer who violates any provision of section 6 or section 7, or any provision prescribing minimum wages contained in any regulation or order of the Administrator issued under section 14, shall be liable to the employee or employees affected in the amount of their unpaid minimum compensation, or their unpaid minimum overtime compensation, as the case may be, and in an additional equal amount as liquidated damages.'

"SEC. 11. Section 17 (including the heading thereof) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'INJUNCTION PROCEEDINGS

"'SEC. 17. The district courts of the United States, including the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and the United States courts of the Territories and possessions, shall have jurisdiction, for cause shown, and subject to the provisions of section 17 (relating to notice to opposite party) of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 28, sec. 381), to restrain violations of section 15. Any such action may be brought in the district wherein the defendant is found or is an inhabitant or transacts business, and process in such cases may be served in any other district of which the defendant is an inhabitant or wherever the defendant may be found. No costs shall be assessed against the Administrator in any proceeding under this act.'

"SEC. 12. The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'PROHIBITION AGAINST INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS

"'SEC. 20. In order to protect the minimum wage and maximum hours standards prescribed in sections 6 and 7, it shall be unlawful for any person knowingly to transport or cause to be transported, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, or aid or assist in obtaining transportation for or in transporting any goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined wholly or in part by convicts or prisoners (except convicts or prisoners on parole or probation), or in any penal or reformatory institution, from one State, Territory, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country, into any State, Territory, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous but subject to the jurisdiction thereof. Nothing herein shall apply to commodities manufactured in Federal penal and correctional institutions for use by the Federal Government. Any person who violates the provisions of this section shall be subject to the penalties provided by section 16 (a). The provisions of this section shall not be deemed to repeal or supersede any other act relating to the transportation or sale of goods made by convicts or prisoners.'"

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read.

Mr. MICHENER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is that the Ramspeck bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the so-called Ramspeck bill.

Mr. MICHENER. In other words, the gentleman is offering the Ramspeck amendment provided for in the rule?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MICHENER. And it is being offered according to the rule?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In order to comply with the rule that it might be considered at this time, and for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FISH. I would like to know whether unanimous consent has been given for the consideration of the Ramspeck amendment and whether that has been put to a vote?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides for the substitution of the Ramspeck bill for the so-called Norton bill, H. R. 5435.

Mr. FISH. I understood the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] had withdrawn that proposal.

The CHAIRMAN. Any Member can offer the amendment, even though the gentleman from Georgia does not desire to do so, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has offered that amendment.

Mr. FISH. I thought he asked unanimous consent to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. No. He asked unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. May the Clerk read the number of the bill that has been offered as a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered, including the number of the bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee moves to strike out all after the enacting clause in the bill H. R. 5435 and insert in lieu thereof all the provisions of the bill H. R. 7349.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state for the benefit of the Committee that this is the so-called Ramspeck bill and is offered under the rule as a substitute for the Norton bill.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it now in order for the Barden bill to be offered as a substitute for the Ramspeck bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not until the gentleman from Tennessee has been recognized. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield for a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I make this inquiry, Mr. Chairman: I hold in my hand now the bill H. R. 5435. The bill the House is now considering is H. R. 5435, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The Clerk is proceeding to read the matter which has been stricken out in the bill H. R. 5435. It appears to me that what is before this House now is a bill with an amendment reported out by the committee. Why, therefore, does the Clerk not read the part that has not been stricken out by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill that was reported was H. R. 5435, and the Clerk has read the first section of that bill. The rule provides that a substitute commonly known as the Ramspeck bill may be offered to the Norton bill, and the Ramspeck bill has now been offered as a substitute.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I am afraid the Chair did not understand my inquiry. The Clerk has read matter that has been sticken out in the bill made in order by the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct, but that is the bill that was reported by the committee.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. It is a fact, then, is it, that the committee voted a rule out for the original of H. R. 5435 before these amendments were adopted by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. WOOD. The stricken matter is identical with the original bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The bill as reported out, the Norton bill, will be subject to amendment after we have disposed of the Ramspeck bill and the Barden bill. That is why the Clerk has read the stricken matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose at this time to take the time allotted to me except to make one brief observation, that I offered this amendment which contains the subject matter of the so-called Ramspeck bill simply in order to comply with the rule heretofore adopted by the House.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from North Carolina rise?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. To offer a substitute for the Ramspeck amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a substitute for the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina offers a substitute for the Byrns amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed in said amendment insert the following:

"That section 5 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(e) No industry committee appointed under subsection (a) of this section shall have any power to recommend the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to any employees in Puerto Rico or in the Virgin Islands. Notwithstanding any other provision of this act (except section 7 (c) and section 13), the Administrator may appoint a special industry committee to recommend the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to all employees in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, or in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, or the Administrator may appoint separate industry committees to recommend the minimum rates or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to employees therein engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce in particular industries. An industry committee appointed under this subsection shall be composed of residents of such island or islands where the employees with respect to whom such committee was appointed are employed and residents of the United States outside of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. In determining the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid, and in determining classifications, such industry committees and the Administrator shall be subject to the provisions of section 8 and no such committee shall recommend, nor shall the Administrator approve, a minimum wage rate which will give any industry in Puerto Rico or in the Virgin Islands a competitive advantage over any industry in the United States outside of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.'

"(b) No wage orders issued by the Administrator under section 8 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 pursuant to the recommendations of an industry committee made prior to the enactment of this act shall be applicable with respect to any employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands.

"SEC. 2. Section 6 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(c) The provisions of paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (a) of this section shall be superseded in the case of any employee in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce only for so long as and insofar as such employee is covered by a wage order issued by the Administrator pursuant to the recommendations of a special industry committee appointed pursuant to section 5 (e).'

"SEC. 3. Section 7 (c) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended to read as follows:

"'(c) No employer shall be deemed to have violated subsection (a) by employing any employee for a workweek in excess of that specified in such subsection without paying the compensation for overtime employment prescribed therein if such employee is so employed in connection with or incidental to—

"'(1) the grading or storage of grain at terminal markets, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations; or

"'(2) the wholesale distribution of perishable or seasonal fresh fruits and vegetables, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations; or

"'(3) the storage at terminal markets of any seasonal or perishable agricultural or horticultural commodity, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations; or

"'(4) the felling of trees, logging, or operations incidental to the felling of trees or logging performed prior to delivery, and the delivery, of the logs to a mill for sawing, making pulp, or other processing; and if such employee receives compensation for employment in excess of 56 hours in any workweek at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed. In the case of an employer engaged in any of the operations specified in paragraphs (1) to (4), inclusive, of this subsection, neither the provisions of subsection (a) nor the limitation of 56 hours in any workweek, during a period or periods of not more than 14 workweeks in the aggregate in any calendar year shall not apply to his employees in any place of employment where he is so engaged. In the case of an employer engaged in the grading, loading, slaughtering, or dressing of livestock, or preparing products therefrom at the packing plant, or in handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations, and in the case of an employer not exempted under the provisions of section 13 (a) (11) (F) engaged in the canning, processing, or preserving of any perishable or seasonal fruits or vegetables, including dried fruits, or in handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations, the provisions of subsection (a), during a period or periods of not more than 16 workweeks in the aggregate in any calendar year, shall not apply to his employees in any place of employment where he is so engaged. As used in this subsection, "terminal market" in the case of any agricultural or horticultural commodity means any urban center of more than 150,000 population (according to the last decennial census) where such agricultural or horticultural commodity is customarily stored before processing or where such commodity is customarily stored and the greater part thereof distributed to consumers within or adjacent to such urban centers.'

"SEC. 4. (a) The heading of section 11 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: '; Rules and regulations.'

"(b) Section 11 of such act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(d) The Administrator shall have power to make, issue, amend, and rescind such regulations and orders as are necessary or appropriate to carry out any of the provisions of this act. Without limiting the generality of the foregoing, such regulations and orders may define terms used in this act, make special provisions with respect to, including the restriction of home work subject to this act to the extent necessary to safeguard the minimum standards provided in this act or in any regulation or order issued pursuant thereto, and make special provision for voluntary constant wage plans consistent with the purposes of section 7. The regulations and orders of the Administrator shall be published in the Federal Register and shall be effective 10 days after publication or at such later date as the Administrator shall direct.

"'(e) No provision of this act imposing any liability or disability shall apply to any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with any regulation or order of the Administrator, notwithstanding that such regulation or order may, after such act or omission, be amended or rescinded or be determined by judicial authority to be invalid for any reason.'

"SEC. 5. (a) Section 13 (a) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by striking out all of clause (1) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: '(1) any employee employed in a bona fide executive, administrative, professional, or local retailing capacity, or in the capacity of outside salesman, or at a guaranteed monthly salary of $150 or more, or at a guaranteed yearly salary of $1,800 or more, if such employee is not required by his employer to work any specified minimum number of hours in any workday, workweek, or other period and has been notified by his employer in writing to that effect; or.'

"(b) Section 13 (a) of such act is further amended by striking out clause (10) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: '(10) any switchboard operator, during any calendar year, employed in a public telephone exchange which at all times during the preceding calendar year had less than 500 stations; or (11) any employee employed in connection with or incidental to the—

"'(A) cooling, freezing, separating, pasteurizing, drying, fermenting, grading, packing, making, evaporating or condensing, or preparing for market, of milk, skimmed milk, cream, whey, butter, ice cream, ice-cream mix, cheese, or casein, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations, except that the provisions of section 6 shall apply to any employee employed in connection with or incidental to the evaporating or condensing of milk or in handling or transportation in connection therewith or incidental thereto unless such employee is exempted from the provisions of section 6 by reason of being employed in connection with or incidental to or in handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to any other operation specified in this subparagraph;

"'(B) ginning, compressing, or storing of cotton, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(C) processing of sugar beets, sugar-beet molasses, sugarcane, or maple sap, into sugar or into sirup (but not the refining of raw sugar), or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(D) extracting (but not fermenting or refining), oils, juices, or sirups, and other derivatives from domestic vegetables, fruits, nuts, or seeds, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(E) preparing, cleaning, grading, packing, drying, peeling, shelling, precooling, refrigerating, freezing, or local storing of seasonal or perishable fruits or vegetables, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(F) canning, processing, or preserving of any perishable or seasonal fruit or vegetable (including handling and transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations) if his employer does not engage during the same calendar year in canning, processing, or preserving any agricultural commodity except perishable or seasonal fruits or vegetables and does not engage during the same calendar year in recanning any agricultural commodity or product thereof;

"'(G) cleaning, grading, drying, shelling, preparing, packing, or local storing of nuts, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(H) feeding, loading, grading, inspecting, or marketing when those operations are performed prior to marketing for slaughter, and marketing for slaughter, of livestock, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(I) shearing, grading, bagging, or local storing, of grease wool, mohair, and rabbit fur, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(J) fattening, slaughtering, refrigerating, dressing, packing, or local storing, of poultry, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(K) grading, shell-treating, candling, freezing, local storing, drying, or packing of eggs, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(L) hatching or marketing of chicks, poults, ducklings, or goslings, or birds when permitted by law, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(M) grading, hand-picking, cleaning, or local storing (but not including terminal-market storage), of grains, dry edible beans or peas, and seeds, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(N) extracting, preparing, packaging, or local storing, of honey, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(O) tying, drying, stripping, grading, redrying, fermenting, stemming, or packing, of leaf tobacco prior to storage, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(P) local storing, grading, packing, or packaging of nursery or other horticultural or floral stock or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations;

"'(Q) cleaning, drying, packing, local storing, grading, grinding, baling, or preparing, of hops, forage, fiber, and other agricultural or horticultural commodities not otherwise mentioned in subparagraphs (A) to (Q) of this clause, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations; or

"'(R) the cutting of timber for manufacture into lumber, or the manufacture, preparing for market, or marketing, of lumber (including handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations) during any calendar year if his employer at no time during such calendar year employed in connection with or incidental to all such operations in the aggregate more than 15 employees.

"'As used in subparagraphs (A) to (Q), inclusive, of this clause "local storing" means that storage used outside of "terminal markets" as defined in section 7 (c).'

"SEC. 6. Section 13 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: '; or (3) any employee of an employer subject to the provisions of part I of the Railway Labor Act.'

"SEC. 7. (a) The heading of section 14 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: '; home work in rural areas.'

"(b) Section 14 of such act is amended (1) by inserting '(a)' after 'SEC. 14.'; (2) by striking out 'learners, of apprentices, and of messengers employed exclusively in delivering letters and messages,' and inserting in lieu thereof 'learners and of apprentices,'; and (3) by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: 'The Administrator may by regulation or order provide for the employment of telegraph messengers engaged primarily in the delivery of letters and messages at such wages (but not less than 25 cents per hour) lower than the minimum wage applicable under section 6 as will prevent curtailment of opportunities for such employment with a public telegraph carrier.'

"(c) Section 14 of such act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(b) The Administrator shall promulgate regulations permitting the employment, in rural areas, of employees in the home at such wages lower than the minimum wage applicable under section 6 as will prevent curtailment of opportunities for employment. No such regulation shall be promulgated with respect to any employees (1) if in the opinion of the Administrator the application of section 6 to such employees does not have the effect of curtailing the opportunities of such employees for employment; (2) if the promulgation of such regulation would in the opinion of the Administrator have the effect of curtailing employment in the factories or industrial establishments, if any, in which similar work is performed; or (3) if the promulgation of such regulation would in the opinion of the Administrator give the employer or employers of such employees a substantial competitive advantage.'

"SEC. 8. Section 15 (a) (1) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by striking out the first semicolon therein and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: 'except that no provision of this act shall impose any liability upon any person for violating any of the provisions of this section if such person, in a proceeding brought to impose such liability, establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that at the time he acquired a property interest in the goods transported, offered for transportation, shipped, delivered, or sold, or sold with knowledge that shipment or delivery or sale thereof in commerce was intended, he had no knowledge or reason to believe that such goods were produced in violation of any of the provisions of section 6 or section 7, or in violation of any regulation or order of the Administrator issued under section 14; and.'

"SEC. 9. Section 15 (a) (2) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(2) to violate any of the provisions of section 6 or section 7, or any of the provisions of any regulation or order of the Administrator issued under section 14, or any of the provisions contained, pursuant to section 8 (f), in any order of the Administrator issued under section 8.'

"SEC. 10. (a) The first sentence of section 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended to read as follows: 'Any employer who violates any provision of section 6 or section 7, or any provision prescribing minimum wages contained in any regulation or order of the Administrator issued under section 14, shall be liable to the employee or employees affected in the amount of their unpaid minimum compensation, or their unpaid minimum overtime compensation, as the case may be, and in an additional equal amount as liquidated damages.'

"(b) Section 16 (b) of such act is further amended by adding before the period at the end thereof the following: 'but no action to recover such liability shall be maintained unless commenced within 6 months from the day when the cause of action accrued, or 6 months from the date of enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act Amendments of 1939, whichever is the later.'

"SEC. 11. Section 17 (including the heading thereof) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'INJUNCTION PROCEEDINGS

"'SEC. 17. The district courts of the United States, including the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and the United States courts of the Territories and possessions, shall have jurisdiction, for cause shown, and subject to the provisions of section 17 (relating to notice to opposite party) of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 28, sec. 381), to restrain violations of section 15 and violations of regulations and orders issued to carry out any of the provisions of section 6 or section 7, except that the court shall not have power to restrain any violation of any such regulation or order unless it is shown that at least 5 days prior to the filing of the complaint the defendant was notified that such regulation or order was in force. Any action under this section may be brought, in case such action is brought to restrain violations of section 15 (a) (1), in the district in which the prohibited employment is alleged to have occurred, and in all other cases, in the district in which the alleged violation occurred. Process in such cases may be served in any district of which the defendant is an inhabitant or wherever the defendant may be found. No costs shall be assessed against the Administrator in any proceeding under this act.'

"SEC. 12. The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'PROHIBITION AGAINST INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS

"'SEC. 20. In order to protect the minimum wage and maximum hours standards prescribed in sections 6 and 7, it shall be unlawful for any person knowingly to transport or cause to be transported, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, or aid or assist in obtaining transportation for or in transporting any goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined wholly or in part by convicts or prisoners (except convicts or prisoners on parole or probation), or in any penal or reformatory institution, from one State, Territory, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country, into any State, Territory, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous but subject to the jurisdiction thereof. Nothing herein shall apply to commodities manufactured in Federal penal and correctional institutions for use by the Federal Government. Nothing herein shall apply to commodities manufactured in any State penal or correctional institution if such commodities are manufactured (a) for the exclusive use of such State, or (b) for use (but not for sale) by such State to carry out its governmental functions. Any person who violates the provisions of this section shall be subject to the penalties provided by section 16 (a). The provisions of this section shall not be deemed to repeal or supersede any other act relating to the transportation or sale of goods made by convicts or prisoners.'

"SEC. 13. This act may be cited as the 'Fair Labor Standards Act Amendments of 1939.'"

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the reading of the substitute amendment will be dispensed with, it to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I really feel as though the substitute should be read because there are, no doubt, Members present who may desire to offer perfecting amendments to the substitute. I feel that the bill should be read in order that amendments may be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman that the Barden bill is offered as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, the Ramspeck bill. If the pending request is granted, then amendments to the so-called Barden bill will be in order.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Is it, then, the ruling of the Chair that the entire substitute amendment must be read before any amendment can be offered to any section?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; if objection is made to dispensing with the reading of it.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. A further parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Would it be in order to offer amendments to any section of the so-called Barden amendment during the reading of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The so-called Barden bill is offered as a substitute for the amendment and, therefore, would be subject to amendment at any point after the substitute was read, the so-called Barden bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's 5 minutes not start until after the parliamentary inquiries are disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the Committee is, Shall the reading of the substitute be dispensed with?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I hope this will not be taken out of the gentleman's time, it is my understanding that with two substitutes pending there can only be one amendment offered to each pending substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. There cannot be an amendment to the Norton bill until after the substitutes are disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object for the purpose of propounding a parliamentary inquiry. Is the Ramspeck amendment still pending?

The CHAIRMAN. It is. It has been offered as a substitute for the Norton bill. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in order that we may proceed strictly in compliance with the rule, I ask unanimous consent to delete or strike out the word "not" in line 20, page 4, in the amendment that I just offered, which does away with the double negative.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN]?

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the substitute just offered by me is one that has the genuine and the wholehearted approval of agriculture. It has been a very difficult problem to work this bill out and to restrain some who wanted to go too far, but this bill now has the wholehearted approval of agriculture in this country. I have just received a long cablegram from the Puerto Rico Farmers' Association, which I am informed by the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico is a very fine, representative organization down there, in favor of this bill. Here is a large list of those who have approved this bill, including such organizations as the American Farm Bureau Federation, the Grange, and others.

When I say this bill has the approval of agriculture, I mean just what I say. I have heard gentlemen from some of the larger cities say, "Oh, no; the Grange, the Farm Federation, and those organizations do not represent agriculture." I say to you, Mr. Chairman, if they do not represent agriculture, can it be truly said that Mr. Green and Mr. Lewis do not represent labor? I think that conclusion would be just as logical.

There is a possibility that some amendments, in the opinion of the House, may be needed to perfect this bill, but I submit to you that the substance of H. R. 7133 has been carefully worked out, it has been orderly arranged, and if any amendments are necessary, this certainly is the place to offer them. My fight has been to bring this matter to the floor of the House in order that the Members may have the opportunity to pass upon this matter and to have whatever amendments they think are necessary added to the act.

What should I say about H. R. 5435, which is generally known as the Norton bill? Mr. Chairman, those who are attempting to convey the idea that they are for the Norton bill are not for it it, as a matter of fact. They want the worst bill they can bring before us in order to rip it to pieces; and, mark my words, when we begin to vote on H. R. 5435 you are going to see some of the very ones who have left the inference that they are for that bill, otherwise known as the Norton bill, vote against it. The Norton bill is not representative of the views of agriculture. Agriculture has not asked for a 60-hour week, although the Norton bill provides for the 60-hour week in the hours section. Agriculture has not asked for that, I repeat.

Let me make one thing clear, because I want to be perfectly frank. I have taken from the Administrator the right to write criminal law that carries a $10,000 fine and 6 months imprisonment with it, and I believe this is in line with the views of the majority of the Members of the House. There is a remedy for him, but it is through injunction and not by way of the criminal courts. I do not believe this House wants a man sitting down there writing criminal law with such a sting to it as the Norton bill would have.

Now, I shall take up the bills briefly. Let us take H. R. 5435 and H. R. 7133. The entire first section of H. R. 5435 is the same as my bill, H. R. 7133. Section No. 2 is the same. Then we come to the hours section, which is section 3, known as section 7 (c).

When we get to the hours section, the Norton bill does not carry even the exemptions that are provided in the present law. Milk, for instance, is restricted, grain and meat are exempted from the hours provision, and cottonseed is left out. I may say right here that cottonseed has already dropped $1 on account of the area-of-production definition and, mind you, the tenant farmer grows and owns one-half of the seed and that dollar comes out of him. Beginning with the hours provision we part. The Norton bill, H. R. 5435, has a number of exemptions that are carried as total exemptions in H. R. 7133, under the hours exemptions only.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. NORTON. I notice the gentleman has said "she" put in those exemptions. Please correct that and say that the committee decided to do that.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I certainly accept the correction.

Mrs. NORTON. As a matter of fact, the chairman of the Labor Committee is very much against several of the provisions carried in the H. R. 5435 amendment.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I expect the gentlewoman will probably vote against the whole bill then?

Mrs. NORTON. We will see about that.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I want to give the facts and I accept the correction.

Going further with the hours situation, the committee, I will say, moved those exemptions over. Now, try to fit it into the law as it is now, and you will find that agriculture is completely ripped; yet it looks pretty in the bill.

I will move along. As I said a moment ago, there is a provision in the bill H. R. 5435 for 60 hours. The Barden bill makes provision for 56 hours, and a 16 weeks' exemption. In the original act the exemption is 14 weeks. It was understood that the 2 weeks extra was needed to cover the flood season as far as the product was concerned.

Now we move over to section 4, subsection (b), which is a very, very important section. This provision in H. R. 5435 is the same as the provision in H. R. 7133, except that in the Norton bill the orders are effective upon publication and in my bill there is a 10-day notice provision, which I believe every man and woman will agree is a good provision.

On page 6 of H. R. 7133, in subsection (e), there is a good-faith provision, providing that where an order or regulation is issued by the Administrator, and the person to whom it is issued complies with the regulation or order, then as long as that person complies with it he shall be immune from suit. I believe everybody will agree with that provision.

The next provision we come to deals with the famous "white collar" situation. As the situation is now, you have under the wage-hour law men drawing as high as $7,000 a year. If they go back to work after hours, to attend to their business or sign their mail, then the employer has to pay them overtime at the rate of $7,000 a year divided by the hours. This is perfectly absurd. The act was never intended to cover that type of employee. Therefore I wrote into this bill provisions for exemption of those drawing a guaranteed salary of $150 per month, or $1,800 a year, where the employee is not required to work any minimum number of hours; in other words, he is the keeper of his own time, and must be notified in writing to that effect.

On page 7 of H. R. 7133, under subsection (b), we come to section 13 (a). This is the telephone provision. There is no controversy over this situation, and it is perfectly all right to strike out this provision. An amendment has been placed in the present law which exempts telephone companies having less than 500 stations. There is a slight change in that, but not important. This was drawn before the amendment was adopted to the law last year.

Then we come to the agricultural exemptions from hours and wages, and I ask that you read those carefully and compare them with section 13 (a) (10) of the law. The only difference is that my bill does not leave the area of production for the Administrator to define, as is the case in the present act, and all of you know what the Administrator has done with the term "area of production."

I shall not take up each one of the individual exemptions. I ask you to look at H. R. 7133, beginning with the hour and wage exemptions on page 7, and read through the exemptions. One or two of them are carried in the Norton bill, but the main and principal difference between the Norton bill and my bill, H. R. 7133, is that the Norton bill extends to agriculture, or a part of agriculture, only hours exemptions.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, section 7, subsection (c), amends section 14 of the act by adding a subsection (b), which starts as follows:

> The Administrator shall promulgate regulations permitting the employment, in rural areas—

Under his interpretation, at the present time, piece work or home work in rural communities has been completely wiped out.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TARVER. Am I correct in my viewpoint that this provision is contained in identically the same language in all three of the pending bills?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Yes; and it has been approved by the committee and approved by everybody that has looked at it. I believe it is a most fair provision.

There is one change in section 8, on page 13, which relates to a man who purchases goods without notice of any violation of the law in good faith and comes in and shows by a preponderance of evidence that he had no notice that the goods were produced in violation of the wage-hour law. When he does that, my position is that he should not be punished for it, because at the present time a man can buy goods and can take an affidavit from the seller that they were produced under the wage-hour law, and if it later develops that they were not produced under the law they are "hot goods," and he has no way of disposing of them except in intrastate sales.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Very briefly.

Mrs. NORTON. Of course, the gentleman knows that the same provision is in all the bills.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Yes; I believe it is.

The next provision is section 11, on page 14, of H. R. 7133. This is the same as in H. R. 5435.

The next provision is one which fixes the 6 months' statute of limitations. I do not know whether that is too short or too long, but I say that it is a matter that the House is perfectly capable of passing on, but there should be some limit, because when an operation is carried on, with probably 90 percent of the expense of that operation labor cost, and it is allowed to run on for 2 years, you simply wipe the business out and everybody loses his job. So there should be a limitation of 6 months to 1 year to keep down the destruction of business, and especially small business.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. If you will be brief, yes.

Mr. HEALEY. Does the gentleman know of any other statute of limitations that is as short as he proposes in this bill, affecting any property rights anywhere?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. May I say to the gentleman that there are statutes of limitation as short as that.

Mr. HEALEY. I would like to have the gentleman produce one of them.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I will say this to the gentleman: I do not know of any other regulation put on business that carries the penalties that this regulation carries.

Mr. HEALEY. But the gentleman knows of no other statutory exemption as low as he proposes.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I do not know of any penalty as large as this.

Mr. HEALEY. But you want to impose this on the rights of labor, although there is not any other similar statute anywhere.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. That is a matter in the power of the House.

Now, passing that, H. R. 5435 is the same down to line 8, on page 15, and then comes the notice for injunction.

I remove from the power of the Administrator the right to write the criminal law, but this provision was written in in order to enable the Administrator to enforce the rules and regulations by injunctive relief, and he has to give 5 days' notice; if the employer puts his house in order within the 5 days' time, there is no necessity of cluttering up the courts with a lot of lawsuits.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary situation created by this rule, as I see it, is simply this: The real controversy here is between the committee bill and the Barden bill. It was for that reason that I did not offer the bill bearing my name, and for the further reason that I do not want any bill bearing my name to contain exemptions from a 30-cents-an-hour wage. You can disregard the bill offered by the gentleman from Tennessee which bears my name, because everything in it, except one thing, an amendment dealing with a mining situation out West, is in both the Barden bill and the committee bill. So there is no use to adopt the bill which bears my name.

I rise in opposition to the philosophy of the Barden bill. If you have examined the comparison of these three bills contained in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 2260, you will find that, speaking broadly, there is only one difference between the two bills, one important difference between the committee bill and the Barden bill. You will find on page 2261, in the right-hand column, a list of a number of processes which are completely exempted from the wage and hour law by the Barden bill. They are completely exempted both as to wages and hours, on the theory, as I said here last week, that the processing of these products of the farms is reflected back in the price paid to the farmer. Now, I think unquestionably there are some processing charges that a farmer does pay. For instance, in my section of the country a farmer pays for the ginning of his cotton. He pays that out of his own pocket. You can be definite about that. If he puts it in a warehouse and retains title to it, he pays for the storage, of course, and to that extent any increase in the cost of those operations is directly traceable to the farmer. There are many processes, however, which are completely exempted under the Barden bill, which, it seems to me, have only the remotest relation to farming. They are processes which are certainly industrial, if I am any judge of industrial operations.

I have here in my hand, and, of course, they cannot be put into the RECORD, a number of photographs taken of canning plants, and packing plants, showing that these plants are just full of machinery. They are industrial plants. They are operated by industrial workers who go into those plants, and work under conditions that are no different, so far as I can see, from the conditions in a cotton mill, or a textile mill, or any other industrial operation.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I am sorry I have not time to yield.

You will find that they carry on all sorts of mechanical operations in these plants.

Yet the Barden bill proceeds upon the theory that those are farmers in these plants, or that the farmers are paying for these operations. The committee recognized the fact that the definition of "area of production" made by the Administrator, Mr. Andrews, is not satisfactory, and in an honest and earnest effort to solve that problem reported the committee bill, which keeps those people under the wage provision, but gives them a 60-hour week all the year 'round, and for 14 weeks in each year a complete exemption from the hours provision. The purpose of that is to take care of just such situations as were described so ably last week by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], where weather conditions make it necessary to process certain farm commodities immediately, and without regard to hours. Certainly we do not want to make any employee or group of employees work over 60 hours a week, and yet we do give 14 weeks during the season and they can pick any 14 weeks they want, to operate without limitation of hours at all, and they can work their employees 24 hours a day without paying a cent of overtime. All they have to pay under this bill is 30 cents an hour. That is what is offered by the committee bill. Do we need to go as far as the Barden bill goes? Do we want to take from under the pittance of 30 cents an hour these employees who work in canning factories and packing plants and other processing plants throughout the country that handle agricultural commodities? Do we, as Members of Congress, drawing $10,000 a year, or $25 a day, want to go back home and say to our people that we are not going to provide a minimum wage, a bottom to the wage of 30 cents an hour for the employees who work in these industrial plants, simply because they are working on agricultural products? What is the difference between processing cotton and processing peas, or any other agricultural commodity? They are both raised on the farm. I cannot see the justification for it, and while I realize that the lowest-paid people in this country, for what they do, are the farmers, and I personally have voted for every effort that this Congress has made since I have been a member of it to help raise the income of the farmers and expect to continue that policy, yet I do not believe that we can help the farmer by denying a minimum wage to the workers in the industrial plants, simply because they are processing something that comes off the farm. I believe that the way to help the farmer in this situation is to say that the man who buys the farmer's products be permitted at least to make 30 cents an hour because thereby he will be better able to buy the products of the farmer. [Applause.]

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. PEARSON. In connection with the statement on the part of the gentleman, I have read the comparative statement of the three bills appearing in the RECORD, and I drew the conclusion from a study of that comparison that the Norton, or the committee bill, narrows the exemptions given to agriculture and actually takes out from the protection of the present law some groups by virtue of the wording of the Norton bill. I ask the gentleman whether or not I am correct in that conclusion?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not so understand it. I may be mistaken as to some particular commodity.

Mr. PEARSON. Particularly with reference to the dairying industry. Does not the committee bill allow exemptions to the dairying industry and take out of the protection of existing law a certain group?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not think it does. If I am mistaken about that, I should be very glad to have the gentleman point it out. The gentleman may be thinking in terms of what he thought would be exempted under the definition of the area of production. It is true that a good many people thought that they were going to get exemptions under that interpretation but did not get them, and therefore they might say that we are narrowing the bill.

Mr. PEARSON. I just took it from the figures given in the tables which were placed in the RECORD by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman may be correct, but that is not my understanding of it. My understanding is that we have not taken away any actual exemptions which existed in the present law. It is true that we have taken away the area of production in the committee bill, and, therefore, it might be inferred by some who thought they were entitled to exemption and did not get it under the area of production that we had taken something away.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. As I understand from the gentleman's first statement, his bill now has been offered as a substitute for the Barden bill. I understand that in the Ramspeck bill the provision that was of most importance concerned western mining.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is right.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. If time permitted compliments, I would like to say how much some of us appreciate what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] has done for our public employees and the public service.

I appreciate the fact that the gentleman was considerate enough of western mining that he made some effort to make this law applicable to our western mining. It is very difficult to make such legislation as the Wage and Hour Act fair and just to all parts of our great and variegated country.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I thank the gentleman. I expect to offer that amendment to the pending motion.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I notice on page 2263 of the Appendix of the RECORD the comparative statement. The question was raised by the gentleman a moment ago about additional employees who will not come under the scope of the new Norton bill that come under the present law.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Right at the top of that statement it says "Dairy products 22,000 under the present act, 22,000 under my bill, and none under the Norton bill.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. In other words, there is no one exempt under the Norton bill today, while there are 22,000 exempt under the present law?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct. I stand corrected as to that 22,000.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. And if you will go down that schedule, you will find "fruit, vegetable, and nut oils and juices," 5,000 exempt under the present law. None will be exempt under the Norton bill.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes. The gentleman is correct about that. I am glad to have that correction brought to my attention.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman said a moment ago that he always voted in favor of the farmers. I would like to ask him if he voted for the reciprocal-trade agreements?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Certainly I did, and that is in favor of the farmers, whether the gentleman realizes it or not. [Applause.]

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. COLMER. Is it the contention of the gentleman that such plants as Borden and Carnation Milk and plants like that would be exempt under the Barden bill?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; I think unquestionably they would be exempt from both wages and hours under the Barden bill, and under the Norton or the committee bill they would have the 60-hour week and 14 weeks without the hour limitation, but would be left under the wage provisions of the act; but I point out this to the gentleman, that those plants are unionized, and the unions will take care of the question of hours there.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I would like for you to read the amendment as it appears in my bill.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I have read it. The gentleman and I do not agree as to what it means

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Just listen to this:

> For handling, transportation, etc., except that the provisions of section 6 shall apply to any employee employed in connection with or incidental to the evaporating or condensing of milk or in the handling or transportation.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman and I do not agree about the construction of his bill. I want to say this about the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN]. I at one time lived down there where he comes from, in the city where he lives and in the district which he represents. I hope the people of that district will have the good judgment to send the gentleman back in the coming primary, because he is sincere, capable, and able; but we do not agree about the philosophy of this wage and hour law. I am not questioning what he is trying to do.

He is trying to do what he thinks is right, but I do not believe that we in the South will make any progress by low wages. I think we have to get on the same level eventually with the rest of the country. [Applause.] I do not believe we will help agriculture by holding down the wages of these employees who are essentially industrial workers. I think 30 cents an hour is about as low as we ought to go. We have given them the 60-hour week, which will take care of most of the complaints against this legislation, I think. I point out to you that in the Barden bill also the question of transportation comes up. He is not only exempting the processing but the transportation. How are you going to exempt the transportation of a carload of agricultural products in a freight train without exempting the entire operation of the train from the wage and hour legislation?

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. If the gentleman will look at subsection 5, on page 11, section 3, there is an apparent attempt to give the benefit of the 60-hour exemption to certain canning plants, canners of fruits and vegetables.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Which bill are you referring to?

Mr. KEEFE. I am referring to the Norton bill, on page 12. But not when those operations are performed at a terminal establishment. In the definition of "terminal establishment," found on page 14 of the bill, it is described as one that distributes its goods to wholesalers, retailers, consumers, and manufacturers. In the canning business in Wisconsin—and I assume in every other State in the Union—every canning plant maintains its own warehouse, where its canned products are placed, and distribution takes place from its own warehouse. Thus, every canning factory will be established as a terminal establishment under the definition. You therefore have not given this 60-hour exemption to those plants, have you?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Well, the gentleman might offer an amendment about that. It is the intention, of course, to give it to the actual processors of agricultural commodities, but not to give it to the brokers and warehousers in the terminal sections. I cannot yield further to the gentleman. I must get along.

Mr. KEEFE. I just wanted the gentleman to clear that one point up. That was the intention of the committee, was it not?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is my understanding. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield further.

The National Lumber Manufacturers' Association sent me a letter—I presume it was sent to others also—objecting to one section of the Barden bill; very much to my surprise, because when this act was originally up some of these people were very much opposed to the wage-hour law, but they point to the fact that section 5 (b) of the Barden bill exempts certain lumber operations if they have 15 or less employees, and point out the great discrimination that would take place. The circular is signed by the Appalachian Hardwood Manufacturers, Inc.; the California Redwood Association; the Northeastern Lumber Manufacturers' Association; the Southern Cypress Manufacturers' Association; the Southern Hardwood Producers, Inc.; the Southern Pine Association; the West Coast Lumbermen's Association; and the Western Pine Association. They feel that the Barden bill is discriminatory; that it grants undue advantage to the smaller operator, as compared with the larger.

May I conclude my statement by saying to the committee that I hope it will not go so far as to adopt the Barden bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak on this bill because I have a very certain and a very definite interest in the Barden amendment. I have 32 canning factories in my district. The gentleman from Georgia displayed a number of pictures showing machinery in an average canning factory. I agree with him that a canning factory is full of machinery. But the gentleman from Georgia has no idea of the type of people who are employed in these canning factories in the small towns all over the country. They are kids in high schools, kids from the universities, mothers who take this opportunity to put in a few hours during the canning season and in this way earn a few extra dollars.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWKS. I do not yield. I am talking for the unorganized workers, as they are not involved in this type of work. I am talking for the people who can have only part-time employment, and are happy to get it. Now, let us go into the average canning factory. I have worked there during school vacations and know what I am talking about.

Work in a canning factory is not hard, it is not dangerous work. School kids on vacation, mothers who have the time and need the money, professors from the various high schools work down there as foremen. It is not a highly industrialized set-up at all. It is an industry for small towns. The gentleman from Georgia certainly displayed his ignorance of small communities in this country. As the gentleman from Georgia, his colleague [Mr. Cox], pointed out to the House the other day, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] represents the great city of Atlanta, which certainly is not a small town in any sense of the word.

The Barden bill, with its exemptions to these canning plants, with its exemptions to the cheese factories and the little creameries all over my State, certainly strikes at the bottom of all of the trouble that we have had with this Wage and Hour Act. I appeared before Mr. Andrews last year, as did many hundreds of other people, complaining about his interpretation of the act. In arguing with him he certainly displayed a total ignorance of what the Congress meant, and no disposition to change his mind, even though confronted with loads of testimony to the contrary. The Wage and Hour Act, as it stands today, or as it would be amended by the so-called Norton bill, is absolutely impossible of administration by any man. It cannot be administered, certainly, to satisfy in any sense the canning or dairy industry of my State or the people who work in those great industries. It cannot be made to work under his interpretation or under the interpretations of the present Administrator, for that matter, to satisfy the people who work in these little plants all over my State, and particularly in my district. I hope that the House, in considering the Barden bill, will pass it with just a few minor amendments. The Norton bill is just a subterfuge. The Norton bill never should have been brought before this House, and I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Labor has stated her opposition to her own bill. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK], from the great city of Atlanta, has shown sense enough to withdraw his bill. I am glad he has, because he certainly has demonstrated that he knows nothing about agriculture and agricultural labor. I hope the House will adopt this Barden amendment and thereby bring some relief to the great agricultural interests of my State.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWKS. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. I would like to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that dozens and scores of small tomato-canning operators out on the Ozark hillsides in southwestern Missouri and northwestern Arkansas, the operators of small cheese factories, small sawmills, small creameries, and ice-cream manufacturers, as well as small business institutions and small banks, are unanimously in favor of the Barden bill. The minimum wage is certainly not too high, but unless the Barden amendments are voted many of these small plants and factories will be forced to close and more people will be added to the relief rolls. It is better to receive a small wage than to receive no wage at all. People must be given at least the opportunity to work.

Mr. HAWKS. Our argument against the Wage and Hour Act has no relationship to the wage scale, we are not in conflict with that at all, because the wages paid in Wisconsin are above the minimum wages set forth in the original act. We are not fighting about wages. We are fighting for jobs. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, there has been considerable breast beating in this debate. Many incidents have developed to provoke amusement, but the one that has caused me the most amusement is the action of the chairman of the Labor Committee in disavowing approval of certain provisions of the bill bearing her name and that of my devoted friend and colleague the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK]. Now, I have heard of fathers going under the house in the face of a storm, leaving their offspring to be swept away, but this is the first time I have actually witnessed such a thing. You know this reminds me of the Negro boys that went coon hunting and jumped a bear. They beat the dogs back home.

I presume it is just as well that the gentleman disown his offspring rather than have waited for its execution on the part of the membership of this Committee, who insists of something with more life than this foundling happened to have. I think the House wants to do something serious and sincere in the way of modifying a law which has been used to do great harm to the small-business people and to the farmers of America. The Barden bill proposes to do nothing other than what you thought you were doing when you wrote the law originally. The same principle involved in the Walter bill and in the proposed Smith amendments to the Wagner Act is involved in this proposal which we have before us today, and that is, Has the Congress the competency to determine for itself the meaning of what it does in the way of legislation? In other words, is Congress to further tolerate administrative agents nullifying what Congress does through the substitution of what they think Congress ought to have done? In other words, do you wish to prostrate the people of America and the Congress itself at the feet of these administrative tyrants who, through the substitution of their judgment for that of the Congress, set up regulations having the force and effect of law? Are you to further tolerate their legislating for the Congress of this country?

Let me quote what the great Jefferson said:

> Our laws expressly declare that those who are but delegates themselves shall not delegate to others powers which require judgment and integrity in their exercise.

Mr. Chairman, in the motion now pending there comes to us the challenge whether we are willing to stand upon our own feet in the exercise of our own rights as the delegated agents for the people of this country and do that which we believe is responsive to their real and actual needs or are we going to cower under some kind of a political threat which demands complete and absolute surrender of our rights as Representatives of these United States? [Applause.]

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. NORRELL to the substitute offered by Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina: On page 16, line 24, after the period, insert "nothing herein shall apply to cotton and cottonseed grown or raised by convicts or prisoners."

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Chairman, first of all let me say that my 10 years of legislative experience has indicated to both organized or unorganized labor my intense interest in their welfare and benefit. I am trying to keep the record straight here on a point which is not now included in the wage and hour law. I refer you to page 16, line 24, of H. R. 7133, where I propose to offer this amendment. I propose to permit the penitentiaries of the country that have been growing and selling cotton and cottonseed to continue this kind of activity. The present wage and hour law does not prohibit such activities. We all agree to this.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRELL. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I understand this is to take care of a very delicate situation that the gentleman has in his State, and which exists in several of the other States?

Mr. NORRELL. That is correct.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. There is no objection on the part of anyone over here to that.

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have the gentleman's statement to that effect. I want it understood that this in no way affects union labor, it in no way affects the present law, it was put into this bill in an endeavor by those of us on the Labor Committee who wanted to prohibit prison-made manufactured articles to enter interstate commerce, and we did not have in mind to prohibit the growing of cotton and the selling of cotton and cottonseed, as the same is now being done in several Southern States.

In Arkansas we have a penitentiary with a population of around 2,000. We produce from 3,000 to 7,700 bales of cotton annually on approximately 25,000 acres of rich land. If this bill is enacted into law without my provision, it will mean that we will have to assess an additional tax in Arkansas amounting to something like $350,000 to $500,000 annually in order to maintain our prisoners and at the same time we will have to assess an additional $2,000,000 to build a cell-block system, and so forth, to house these idle convicts.

If all the penitentiaries of the country were prohibited from producing cotton, what would it amount to? Here is the story in a nutshell. If all the penitentiaries in the United States located in States that now grow cotton produce the same cotton annually that Arkansas produces there would be made around 96,000 bales of cotton. A minimum of 12,000,000 bales are produced annually in the entire Nation. So you see you are dealing purely with a matter that is of little importance when you talk about 12,000,000 bales being produced annually.

Mr. HANCOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRELL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HANCOCK. I wonder if the committee took into consideration the fact that there is already existent law on the statute books which covers the subject of transportation of convict labor in interstate commerce, known as the Ashurst-Sumners bill, which was considered by the Judiciary Committee and passed by the House?

This section, if it has any effect at all, supersedes and repeals the existing law. Personally, I do not believe it belongs in this bill at all.

Mr. NORRELL. I do not believe so, either.

Mr. HANCOCK. It is unrelated to the subject of hours and wages. It is an entirely new field, and it does not belong in this bill.

Mr. NORRELL. It is a subject, as the gentleman says, for another jurisdictional committee.

Mr. HANCOCK. When this amendment was adopted, was this point in the minds of the committee?

Mr. NORRELL. I do not believe that was discussed in the committee. If it was, I did not hear it.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that after the pending amendment has been disposed of, in the interest of orderly procedure, in offering amendments to the Barden substitute all amendments to the first section be disposed of before any amendments to any other section are considered, and that this same procedure be followed throughout the consideration of the bill. I believe this would be much less confusing to most of us.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that in disposing of the amendments to the substitute they be offered in sequence to the first section and to succeeding sections, throughout the consideration of amendments to the substitute. Is there objection?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment to the original bill which has to do with the definition of the term "employee employed in a bona fide administrative capacity." Now, a parliamentary inquiry in connection with that. If this request is agreed to, when should my amendment be offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may state that that amendment may be offered after all the amendments to the substitute, the substitute itself, and the substitute for the Norton bill are disposed of. Then the gentleman would have an opportunity to offer the amendment to the original bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Even though it would properly come under the first section of the Barden bill, if there was such a section containing definitions?

The CHAIRMAN. If it were germane to that section, under the request the gentleman would have the right to offer it to the Barden bill.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. If the gentleman will yield, he will find on page 6 of H. R. 7133 a section dealing with exactly what he has in mind, so he may find his opportunity to offer it there.

Mr. BLAND. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, and I do not intend to object, I should like to find out just where we are. At the conclusion of the consideration of the first section will announcement be made that the second section is now open for amendment, so we will know how we are proceeding? I believe the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey is a wise one, but I believe we ought to know when we pass from one section to another.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the Chair will make an announcement of that fact as the consideration of each section is completed.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCK. It is my intention to offer an amendment first to the Barden substitute, and if that substitute is dedefeated, subsequently to the Norton bill itself, adding a new section amending section 3 (f) of the Wage and Hour Act. At what point will this amendment be in order? Will it be in order at the end of the first section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that it would be in order at the end of the first section of the Barden bill.

Mr. HOBBS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the distinguished gentlewoman if it would meet with her approval to dispose of the amendments to this section at this time before adopting her request?

Mrs. NORTON. I said "after the pending amendment."

Mr. HOBBS. I have an amendment to this same section.

Mrs. NORTON. Would not the gentleman be perfectly satisfied to offer it in its place? It would be very much less confusing, I believe.

Mr. HOBBS. Very well.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry. Am I right in assuming now that if we grant this unanimous-consent request we will proceed to perfect the Barden amendment and will not deal further with the Norton amendment until we have perfected the Barden amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this House passed a wage and hour bill itself and that the Senate passed a bill expressing its ideas. Of course, a conference committee was then appointed by the House and by the Senate. This conference committee in the Senate consisted of Senators Pepper and Ellender, both from the deep South, Senator Borah, Senator Thomas of Utah, Senator Walsh of Massachusetts, and Senator La Follette. The House conferees were Mrs. Norton and Messrs. Ramspeck, Keller, Welch, Hartley, Dunn, and Randolph.

These 14 Members of the House and Senate sat together not for a day or 2 days or 3 days, but for 3 weeks, and we worked out every single, solitary phase of this subject of wages and hours with every law in this country or in any other country available to us. We did not jump at conclusions. We fought it out hour after hour, many times far into the night. We brought to the House and to the Senate as good a bill, I believe, as could possibly have been written or as can be written at the present time, because we gave it the study and the consideration, the give and take of the different viewpoints from the different parts of this country, and we did not mince matters a bit. The two men from the South, Senators PEPPER and ELLENDER, are brilliant men who know the rights and opportunities and benefits and interests of the South. They fought for and got what they accepted as being what ought to come to the South. The same was true of those of us who come more from the Midwest and the West.

Before you vote for any amendment here, you ought to be very sure that it is an amendment that will benefit the law as a whole and not some section and not some special interest. Unless we are sure any amendment proposed here is an actual and very certain improvement over the present law, it ought not to be adopted. Any questionable amendment ought to be rejected.

I want to call your attention to the fact that in the conference committee the interests of the farmer and the laborer were well considered and well discussed. We took the view, and it is the view I have taken before this House on many occasions, that there is no such thing as a special farm interest as opposed to a special labor interest, nor a special labor interest as opposed to a special farm interest; that the farmers in this country and their interests are tied to the interests of the laborers of this country as close as my two fingers are. It is equally true that the laborers of this country are tied to the interests of the farmers as close as are those same two fingers. You cannot have a successful farm community and a poverty-stricken labor community; neither can you have a successful and prosperous labor community with a poverty-stricken farm community. If we be the statesmen I believe us to be, when we stop and think things over, we are going to hold those two facts clearly in mind and not permit the interests of one to clash with the other; and what is the philosophy we are fighting for? Every man here knows that, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK], who represents Georgia as well as any man can represent any State, laid down the law and the gospel with respect to the interests of that southern section because he knows thoroughly well, as other southerners are coming to know, if they do not know it already, that the larger interests of the South lie in the establishment and maintenance of average American hours and wages. It was the very gentleman who put forward this bill, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN], who proposed starting at a small wage and increasing gradually, known as the escalator provision and I am glad to again give him credit for that. I have done that before, and I do it gladly again. But I want to call your attention to the fact that in the debates which I had the misfortune to miss during the last week because I was compelled to take my wife home, I find that a full statement of the great number of people who are benefited by this measure was brought out. I find that the benefit to the businesss of the country was clearly stated, and I am glad that has been done and well done.

I have voted every time for every bill that has been put forward here for the benefit of the farmers. I have voted every time for every bill put forward here for the benefit of the laborers of this country. I intend to go on voting for both because only by voting for both can we hope to do what we ought to do for all the people of America. The interdependence of the farmer and the laborer is clearly indicated by the fact that the highest annual farm income was also the highest industrial labor income, and the year of the lowest farm income was also the year of the lowest industrial labor income. The farm income for 1920 was eleven and a quarter billion dollars; the wages of the industrial workers for that year was almost exactly the same—eleven and a quarter billion dollars. The fiscal year of 1933 was the low-income year. That year the farmers received an income of five and a third billion dollars, and the same year the industrial workers received almost exactly the same amount. This is the rule that has varied but little over many years.

We ought to understand also that organized labor has not the full say. There are not more than 8,000,000 organized laborers in America, and there are 32,000,000 unorganized, and I stand here to say to you that we must legislate for every man and woman who labors and every farmer who farms the soil of this country, and we have got to do it like men and like statesmen, with no selfish interest, with no sectional greed, and with no desire to do anything except in the interests of the entire American people.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. In just a moment.

The thing I want to get over to this House is simply this: As soon as we can bring the wages of the South up on the same level as those of the North, the South will be benefited more than the North and it will put our feet on solid ground for legislation in this country; and, if we fail to do that, we fail in our full duty to the business interests of this country as well as the farm interests and labor interests of this country.

I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman wants to help all labor, when you passed this Wage and Hour Act, why did you eliminate the establishment that employs less than eight people and why did you not include the farmers in the bill as you originally passed it?

Mr. KELLER. I think the gentleman ought to read the bill again and read the report on the subject. If I had the time I would be delighted to go into that matter with the gentleman because it was thoroughly and well considered at the time and adopted by a very large majority of this House and the Senate.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I am in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 5 minutes in support of the amendment.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, whether the membership favors the Norton, the Ramspeck, or the Barden bills, I believe the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL] should be agreed to.

There is in each of these bills a provision against the interstate transportation of convict goods. It is not the purpose of the pending amendment to destroy that provision. It is proposed to clarify it.

The purpose of this prohibition, Mr. Chairman, is to prohibit the transportation of any goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, and so forth. It has no application, in reasonable construction, to an agricultural commodity or the transportation of an agricultural commodity. It applies only to goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured by convict labor. The purpose of the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL] is to clarify the language and to state specifically that this section does not apply to cotton or cottonseed. Personally, I wish that the gentleman from Arkansas had offered an amendment on page 16, in line 17, after the word "to" to insert "the growing, ginning, and compressing of cotton, and." For practical purposes I think his language sufficient.

In the report of the chairman of the committee on the Norton bill it is stated that the purpose of this provision with respect to convict-made goods is to make the existing law, known as the Ashurst-Sumners law, applicable to all the States of the Union, whether the sale of convict goods is prohibited or not.

The bill under consideration relates to wages and hours. The prohibition against the transportation of convict-made goods has no place in this bill. There is no question about wages or hours with respect to convict labor. The section against the transportation of convict-made goods should be stricken from all three bills. If there is one place where all laborers receive the same wages and work the same hours it is in prisons.

Under existing law the Ashurst-Sumners Act prohibits the transportation of goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured by prison labor in interstate commerce, provided the transportation is into States where the sale or use is prohibited. The purpose of the section under consideration is to prohibit the transportation, without reference to the laws of the State into which the shipment is made, but I repeat to emphasize that the section has no place in a Wage and Hour Act, or in amendments to such an act. There is a proper place for amending the Ashurst-Sumners Act, but not in the pending measure.

With such an amendment in its proper place I have now no quarrel. It is not applicable now in those States where there is no prohibition or legislation against the purchase of convict-made goods. I repeat, the purpose of this section will not be defeated, and that the section will be clarified by the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL]. As I understand it, in Arkansas, and in Mississippi, as I know, the leasing of convicts is prohibited not only by statute, but in Mississippi by constitution, and we have found in my State, a cotton-growing State, that the best and most humane way of handling convicts is for the State to buy farms and utilize prisoners in the growing of the chief agricultural product of my State, namely, cotton, and the proceeds of that farm are utilized in the maintenance and support of those farms and prisoners. Every dollar of the proceeds of the cotton grown in Mississippi by prisoners, and I am sure in Arkansas, and probably in other States, is used to promote the best interests of those convicts.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. What is the logic in having the wage and hour law applied to any goods produced by convict labor?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I know it has no place in this bill, but I say the only purpose of the Norrell amendment is to clarify the section. If there is any individual or any Member on the floor of this House who could speak for those who grow cotton in competition with convicts, I believe, with all deference and without presumption, I am entitled to speak for them. I speak for the cotton growers.

As a member of the legislature of my State I sought to provide for the prisoners of my State, and we have been able to devise no more humane method than to buy farms and put the prisoners on those farms. They grow cotton, and grow it in competition with others, including me.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. Does the gentleman not think that it costs the State more than 30 cents an hour to employ the prisoners in that way and take care of their upkeep?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. With all due deference to the distinguished gentleman, I would say that the wage and hour provisions have nothing to do with the matter of convict labor.

Mr. WOOD. I think it costs every State more than 30 cents an hour to maintain the prisoners in that way.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I do not know; but wages and hours do not affect convict labor.

Mr. WOOD. I don't think it should come under the act at all, because it costs more than 30 cents an hour to take care of them.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I agree that the section prohibiting transportation should not be in the bill. I congratulate the gentleman from Missouri on his frank statement. I am in accord with his views in this respect. If they are not under the section what is the objection to clarifying the amendment, to say they are not under the bill, as proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas, because there is uneasiness in Arkansas and probably in other States that the administrator of the law will construe cotton as being within the terms of the section. I trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas will be agreed to and at the same time I maintain that cotton, cottonseed, and other agricultural commodities are not within the section. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, it is with considerable hesitation that I rise to oppose an amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL], but for the life of me I cannot understand why the farmers of this Nation are not entitled to the same protection that organized labor is given. We are now farming under a control program for cotton. The cotton farmers, under that program, have reduced their acreage from 25 to 50 percent, in order to cut down the enormous surplus that we have on hand. Why, then, should convict labor be permitted to produce cotton to increase that surplus any more than convict labor should be used to produce a pair of shoes, a plow line, or any other commodity that would compete with organized labor. One great trouble with this Nation today, I think, is that we are not giving the consideration to the farmer that he is entitled to, we are not giving the same protection to the farmer that we are giving to other groups; and while I know that some of you on this floor are tired of hearing about the farmer, let me say to you that for my part I ask no more and I request no less than that the farmers of this Nation be treated with the same consideration and given the same protection that other groups are receiving. I cannot see the wisdom of the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, when my farmers are subjected to a great control program, some of them being cut down to one or two bales of cotton, and I cannot see why any State should be privileged to use convict labor in direct competition with the farmers of that State or any other State.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHENS. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, many of the Members of the House have asked if it is possible to reach some agreement on time, so that they may know when the vote will be taken in the Committee on the substitute Barden amendment. I do not want to be arbitrary about this at all. I would just like to know how many would like to speak on this amendment, so that we can have some idea about how long it will take.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair make a suggestion, as to whether the gentlewoman will designate the amendment to the substitute which is now before the House or the amendment to the Barden substitute itself.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. May I suggest that the lady postpone that request until we dispose of the pending amendment?

Mrs. NORTON. I will be glad to withhold any request for the present, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. KITCHENS].

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, the fact that convicts in Arkansas grow cotton does not affect the acreage in the State of Georgia at all as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] would have you believe. Arkansas, like a good many other Southern States, realized there were very few industries in which to utilize their convicts. We tried the Georgia plan of putting them out in gangs on contract and working them for practically nothing, and we concluded to quit that because it was inhumane.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHENS. We decided that was not humane nor economical, and that the best way in the world to handle a convict was to give him a place out on a farm and treat him right and let him farm in the open air and sunshine and make an honest living, rather than be supported by taxing the people of the State. That is what the convicts in Arkansas are doing, earning most of their own upkeep. They are being treated justly, honestly, and fairly. They are not being treated like they are in the great State of Georgia, where they have chain gangs, notorious, according to some of the information I acquired recently from the newspapers and magazines. We have no such conditions as that existing in our State.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHENS. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that, in Georgia where they used convicts on highways, those convicts are in direct competition with labor that is unemployed?

Mr. KITCHENS. Absolutely. They were in direct competition. Any work a convict may do must necessarily be in competition. But is he to be put up and stall fed at expense of honest people?

Now, we are allowed so many acres of cotton in Arkansas. Each cotton State has its quota of acres. We have lands for convicts to live on and work. We have spent a lot of money on those lands and homes for those convicts. It has cost us a great deal. We are not able financially to change that program very easily. It would be very difficult and most expensive for us to change. I do not know what we would do with those convicts. We have around 2,000 of them down there. There is no complaint as to their working on the farm. They are being cared for. They are doing legitimate work, there is no industrial work for them, and there is no complaint. I ask that the Norrell amendment be supported. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. McCORMACK. In opposition, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I am going to endeavor to keep away from this dispute between the great sovereign States of Arkansas, Georgia, and Mississippi on the question involved in the amendment pending before the Committee now, but I want to make a few observations.

When anybody comes before the Ways and Means Committee seeking an increase of tariff, usually it is with the argument that they must protect the American worker and preserve the American standard of living. Today we find the argument in support of the Barden bill that we must protect and preserve the American farmer. The employees covered by the Barden amendment are in the same category as those who are employed in shoe factories at the present time. We might as well say that an employee of a shoe factory is engaged in an agricultural pursuit as to say that those engaged in canneries or in the processing of farm commodities are engaged in an agricultural activity. Leather in its origin is connected with the farm. We might as well say that those engaged in the fabrication of textiles are also engaged in a farming activity as to say that those who are engaged in the canning and other activities covered by the Barden bill are agricultural employees.

Cotton is grown on the farm. Wool is grown on the backs of the sheep on the farm. The fabrication of raw cotton into the finished product, the fabrication of the raw wool into the finished product is just as much an industrial activity or just as much a farming activity as the canning of farm products. Of course, they are industrial. Employees covered by the Barden amendment—and I have a profound respect for my friend from North Carolina—are engaged in an activity which is separate and distinct from the farm.

If there are small groups directly connected with the farm, let us take care of them in some other way, but do not exempt hundreds of thousands of people. Do not exempt the cannery and other processing plants employing from one to three hundred or more employees. Prepare a proper amendment exempting those directly connected with the farm, if you have an immediate farm problem, without eliminating from the provisions of the wage and hour bill approximately 1,000,000 persons.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox], for whom I have a strong feeling of friendship and respect, unnecessarily took a clip at our friend from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] in relation to disowning his own bill. The action of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] in no way constitutes that. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] was trying to bring about a clear-cut parliamentary situation before this committee. If the Ramspeck bill had not been offered we would be in a much better parliamentary situation than we are at the present time.

My friend, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] is a man of strong convictions, but the other day he made an unnecessary attack on Members who come from city districts. That was the first time in 12 years that I ever heard that argument advanced. I never knew it was a crime for a man to be born in a big city, nor did I know it was a crime for a man to be born on a farm. I never thought I would see the day when, as a Member of this body, any Member would criticize another Member because he represented a city constituency, or on the other hand, that any man representing a city constituency, would criticize another because he represented a farm constituency. The unfortunate injection of unwarranted and irrelevant argument in this debate did not come from those who opposed the Barden bill; it came from my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox]. It ill behooves him to criticize anyone for making strong arguments, because the gentleman from Georgia, himself, is the one who injected unjustified argument into this debate. I hope that during the remainder of the debate we shall hear no such argument impugning the motive of a Member, because he or she represents a country district, or impugning the motive of a Member because he or she happens to represent a city district. [Applause.]

Mr. DEMPSEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New Mexico rise?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I rise in opposition to the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Mexico is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I could not consistently support the amendment offered by the gentleman, who asks that convict labor be permitted to work in competition with farm labor. I do not think that should be considered for a moment. The people of our Nation, I am sure, would not tolerate such a thing. Much has been said here by various Members rather entering the realm of personalities. Such remarks, I believe, have no part or place in consideration of such important legislation. Whether a man comes from the city, or whether he is a member of the Rules Committee, is no reason why abuse should be heaped upon him. There has been much said, too, about whether we desire a uniform wage throughout the United States. Certainly there is nothing in this bill that provides for a uniform wage throughout the country. Thirty cents an hour, or 25 cents an hour, is not the wage being paid in many communities in the United States. That figure was arrived at purely as a minimum subsistence wage and not as one that should be adopted throughout the country as a proper wage.

I do not come from the city; I represent a State that is largely rural. We have no very big towns, speaking of big towns as many of you gentlemen understand the term. Our towns are all small; they are agricultural centers, many of them. But while they are small there is not one of them so small that the employers want to pay less than 30 cents an hour to men engaged in industry; and, so far as I am concerned, I cannot support the Barden amendment upon that basis, notwithstanding the fact I come from an agricultural State.

Why should we, for any reason, exempt the largest dairies in the United States—if not in the world—such dairies as Borden's, such plants as the Sheffield Farms, such cheese manufacturers as Kraft, who get high prices for their products, yet who want to be taken from under the provisions of this bill? I have no tolerance for any such situation. The bigger the industries the less they want to do for those whose need is greatest, except to use their labor on the same basis as peon workers. So, I cannot subscribe to that. I am in favor of bringing the bill to the floor of the House under a wide-open rule, and I have been condemned for it. The original rule was not an open rule because it was my understanding they did not want one. We made a special effort—at least I did—to give in part what was wanted.

I feel that the membership of this House should check and consider these bills and the amendments carefully. Before the vote is cast, let me ask how many Members of this House favor long hours and small wages. Insofar as I am concerned, I do not. I propose to vote for the Norton bill, which I think, in many instances, may go just a little too far. It certainly goes as far as I want it to go. I will vote for any amendments that are really clarifying and helpful, but I will not vote to remove more people from under the provisions of the wage-hour bill; rather, would I vote to put more people under its provisions. I feel that the time has arrived in this country when we should pay an adequate wage; and, frankly, I do not believe that 30 cents an hour is a decent living wage today. [Applause.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the Norrell amendment close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I, like many other Members of Congress, voted for the wage and hour bill with the distinct understanding and sincere belief that the processing of farm products would be exempt from the provisions of the act. The statement has been made repeatedly on the floor of this House that if these amendments pass 1,500,000 men will be deprived of the benefits of the law. That statement is absolutely not correct. If there was anything that Congress intended to do, it was to exempt the processing of farm products from the act. Congress never intended to extend the act to the workers, whatever the number may be, who were employed in the processing of farm products, with the possible exception of the large packing plants. It is because of this reason that various exemptions, including the provision that the law should not apply to the processing of farm products in the area of production and several other provisions, were placed into the act.

Any reasonable interpretation of the area-of-production clause would have carried out the will of Congress. The fact, however, is that the Wage and Hour Division of the Labor Department wrote into the law provisions which Congress did not place there and nullified the exemption provided for in the area-of-production clause.

I went through the Wage and Hour Division of the Labor Department in connection with my work on the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee which wrote their appropriations. I could not understand how any lawyer could make the interpretations of the act which were made by the Legal Division. In going through the Legal Division I found that the man who had charge of the opinion section of the Legal Division, and who had charge of writing all the legal opinions interpreting the Wage and Hour Act, including the area-of-production clause, and opinions affecting every industry from United States Steel down to the little farmer warehouse on the corner—that man was 29 years old on January 3, 1940. He was graduated from Harvard Law School in 1935; was in Mr. Justice Cardozo's office for 18 months; was with Mr. Justice Frankfurter 1 month and in some other legal division a few months. In June 1939, or 4 years after he was graduated, he was made Assistant General Counsel of the Wage and Hour Division and placed in charge of writing all the legal opinions of that Division at a salary of $6,500 a year.

The testimony shows that this man never tried a lawsuit. When I was going to law school I had as a professor one of the greatest legal writers of modern times, a wonderful character and a great teacher. However, like most professors, he had had very little practical experience, and was, of course, idealistic. In teaching us law, every once in awhile he would tell us first what the law was and then what he thought the law ought to be.

There is no question in my mind but this young man is a brilliant and intelligent young man with a future. However, I am firmly convinced that he and those in the Division have been trying to rewrite the wage and hour law. They have interpreted the law as they thought it ought to be written, and not as Congress wrote it. The Wage and Hour Division, through their interpretation of the law, have nullified the area-of-production clause and are attempting to rewrite the law in such a way as to bring under the law hundreds of thousands of workers that Congress never intended should be covered by the law. We now hear the argument advanced that these bills will deprive these employees of the benefit of the wage and hour law. As a matter of fact, these people have never been covered by the law, for Congress attempted, by the area-of-production clause and several other clauses, to specifically exempt them from the law.

To show you how ridiculous and absurd the legal interpretation of the area-of-production clause by the Legal Division has been, I call your attention to the testimony given before our subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee by Mr. McNulty and Mr. Vincent. Mr. McNulty is the chief counsel of the Wage and Hour Division, and Mr. Vincent has charge of the Hearing Division, which determines what the rules and interpretations are to be. Mr. Vincent appeared before the subcommittee at my specific request. I now quote from page 399 of part I of the hearings on the Labor Department-Federal Security Agency appropriation bill for 1941:

Mr. ENGEL. I personally feel that the Department has written into the law things that Congress did not write into it, and that they are giving it interpretations not in accord with the intent of Congress. Let us get at this in a given case. Mr. Vincent, you determine the facts in any particular cause and get advice as to the law.

Mr. VINCENT. Yes.

Mr. MCNULTY. We advise as to what we think the law is.

Mr. ENGEL. Here is a case: Tell me where you got this law. Here is a farmer that owns 80 acres of land in a rural community. He grows potatoes or beans. We will say he takes 50 bushels of those potatoes or beans in an old-fashioned steel-tired wagon, hitches an old team of broken-down horses to it, and hauls those potatoes or beans 2 miles to a town of 150 people, in which there is a warehouse owned and operated by some 400 farmers. According to the ruling you made, * * * that warehouse was held not to be in the area of production because it had more than seven employees, but if this farmer went across to the next lot 50 feet away he was in the area of production because they had two employees. Was not that ruling put out by your department?

Mr. MCNULTY. Assuming that——

Mr. ENGEL (interposing). Was not that your ruling? That where there were packing houses or warehouses of that type and they had seven employees they were not in a production area; is that not a fact?

Mr. MCNULTY. Assuming they were not processed by a farmer and the operation not exempt as agricultural.

Mr. ENGEL. I am talking about the processing of farm goods.

Mr. MCNULTY. That is right.

Mr. ENGEL. If this was in a town of 150 people and a man carried a bushel of beans in there or potatoes, and if the warehouse had more than seven employees he was not in the area of production.

Mr. MCNULTY. As to the original definition of area of production, that is correct.

Mr. ENGEL. What do you suppose would have happened in Congress if I should have offered an amendment providing that a case of that kind should come under the act? They would have laughed me out of the House, would they not?

Mr. McNulty, unable to give an intelligent answer or explanation of this interpretation, threw up his hands and said:

All I can say, Congressman, is that I wish somebody had presented these difficulties.

In other words, Congress should have written the law more plainly, and yet they oppose all amendments to the bill. But let us continue with the testimony:

Mr. ENGEL. If Congress did not intend to cover that case, what in the world did they intend to cover by the area-reduction exemption, regardless of conditions?

Mr. VINCENT. May I interpose an explanation?

Mr. ENGEL. Yes, sir; I want your explanation on this thing.

Mr. VINCENT. The original rule fixing seven employees——

Mr. ENGEL (interposing). Was not found in the act.

Mr. VINCENT (continuing). Was adopted——

Mr. ENGEL (interposing). Answer my question first. There is nothing in the Wage and Hour Act saying when you have seven or more employees an institution should not be in the area of production. Is that right?

Mr. VINCENT. That is correct. * * * The effect of that ruling, while I will agree with you that there is nothing in the act by which you can derive the figure 7, it is literally true, nevertheless, that by getting at the initial original regulation it operated to protect many thousands of farmers and little houses that processed their products pending time and opportunity to hold hearings for particular industries.

Mr. ENGEL. Yes. And it raised hell with thousands of others who had more than seven employees.

Mr. VINCENT. I have no doubt it occasioned considerable——

Mr. ENGEL (interposing). And the fact remains that you wrote a provision into that law that was not there. What has the number of employees to do with the question whether the plant is in the area of production or not?

Mr. VINCENT. May I add that the Administrator was under obligation to define the area of production. The area of production is not defined in the act.

Here is a direct admission that they have written into the law provisions which the law itself did not contain; provisions which absolutely nullified the area-of-production clause because practically every warehouse of any kind or processing plant has more than seven employees. They had no explanation. Their only excuse was that the area of production was not defined in the act; that the act needed clarification; and yet they oppose any amendments clarifying the act. But let me continue again from page 401 of the testimony:

Mr. ENGEL. For heaven's sake, if Congress did not intend to exclude these small warehouses, what did they intend to exclude by the area of production amendment? You are bringing everybody under the act that you can. To be perfectly frank, those rulings look perfectly asinine to me. It is apparent that you have tried to cover everybody you could. * * * How do you explain these things?

Mr. MCNULTY. It is inevitable in drawing lines that you have to include one competitor as against the other, and it is impossible not to do it.

Again there was no explanation. I quote again from page 406 and again from page 413 where Colonel Fleming testified:

Mr. MCNULTY. The Administrator has as hard a job to decide what Congress meant by the provision "area of production" as that man has to decide what "general vicinity" means, and I think you will agree to that, Congressman.

Colonel FLEMING. May I say something?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Colonel FLEMING. There were two or three things left to his discretion. One is the definition of an area of production. * * *

Mr. SHEPPARD. What has your answer been insofar as it applies to the area of production as to the will of Congress?

Colonel FLEMING. I find it very difficult to find out what Congress meant by the area of production in the legislative history of the act.

In other words, their only justification for the ridiculous and absurd rulings they made under this clause was that they found it difficult to find out what Congress meant by the area of production. The act was indefinite and it needed clarification and yet we find that the administrators and friends of the Wage and Hour Division are opposing practically all amendments which would clarify the act and do what Congress intended it should do, and that is to exempt from the act the processing of farm products.

I stated in the beginning of my remarks that I supported the wage and hour bill with the distinct understanding that the processing of farm products should be exempted from its provisions. I so stated to the labor organizations in my district and made the statement to several members of the Labor Committee.

Let me tell you briefly what is happening to the cherry industry in my section of Michigan. The greater part of the sour cherries produced in the United States are produced in Michigan. Ninety percent of the Michigan sour cherries are produced in my district. In 1927, the cherry growers, farm organizations, and independent canners came to me while I was a member of the Michigan State Senate and I assisted them in obtaining the help of the Agricultural Department and the State chemists in developing out of the sour cherries a maraschino cherry. In 1929, the Republican Party put a tariff on the importation of maraschino cherries. During that year, approximately 22,000,000 pounds of maraschino cherries were imported into the United States from Italy.

The total sour-cherry crop in the United States is approximately 100,000,000 pounds a year. The cherry producer felt that when the trees then planted would come into production we would have a surplus of sour cherries. If we could develop a maraschino cherry and produce at home these 22,000,000 pounds of maraschino cherries imported from Italy, the maraschino-cherry trade would absorb a part of the surplus. The development of the American maraschino cherry was so successful that, with the help of the tariff provision, foreign importations were reduced to a few hundred thousand pounds a year.

We have in my district a cherry industry that is employing hundreds of people. One farmers' cooperative company barreled up in 1 year as high as 10,000,000 pounds of cherries for the maraschino trade. To our amazement and surprise, and over our repeated protests, the State Department made a reciprocal-trade agreement with France reducing the tariff on maraschino cherries 20 percent, and we are now receiving importations of cherries, not from France but from Italy under the most-favored-nation clause. Farmers' prices are forced down as low as 1½ and 2 cents a pound, and they have been producing cherries at a loss for some time.

To increase the cost of production of these cherries by applying the provisions of the wage and hour bill to that industry means that that industry will be ruined. The growers and processors have been trying to get help from the Federal Government during the last 3 months in order to help them overcome the deplorable condition into which this industry has fallen. They cannot increase the selling price because of foreign competition and lowering of the tariff 20 percent. The selling price is absolutely fixed. The cherries for the maraschino trade are hand-pitted, and a large proportion of the cost is in labor. Any increase in the cost of labor must be borne by the farmer or producer. He is now selling cherries at from 1½ to 2 cents a pound, which is at a loss, and any material increase in cost means that he will be forced out of business.

The farmers are held between a vise. They are being crushed between the lowering of the tariff and threatened importations on the one side and the increased cost of the Wage and Hour Act on the other.

Let me point out just one other matter. Even under the Barden bill, any reprocessing places the entire industry under the Wage and Hour Act. These cherries are placed into brine and packed in barrels. Then they are reprocessed in the same plant by women hand pitting the cherries. I have been told by a canner who is well informed that they can ship these cherries packed in brine in a boat from their docks on Lake Michigan through to Italy, have them hand-pitted over there by woman and child labor, and reshipped to the markets in the East for less money than they could have them hand-pitted for even now in their own factory. I am informed that under either of the three bills before the House, if a cherry-packing plant reprocesses one barrel of cherries, that plant comes under the act. Any material increase in the cost will mean that this industry, which employs hundreds of men in my district, will be out of business. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, in my State of Arkansas we are confronted with a serious situation if the amendment proposed by my colleague the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL] is not adopted. We face a condition there, not a theory. A number of years ago Arkansas, like many other States, kept its prisoners within four walls, leasing them out to private individuals for road construction and other work, kept them in chain gangs with a ball and chain on their ankle, and did other things of that kind that remind us of the Middle Ages. A few years ago Arkansas decided to adopt a humane method of dealing with its prisoners. It purchased a large amount of acreage in the cotton-growing section of the State, and the State now owns 25,000 acres of the best cotton land in the State. We have practically done away with the penitentiary. We have torn down the walls. We now keep our prisoners out in the open air and sunshine on this large farm. There are about 2,000 prisoners working there, and they are under the supervision of paid supervisors and trusties. They work under the honor system. By reason of this farm and the cotton raised on it the prison system is self-supporting.

If the Norrell amendment is not agreed to, Arkansas will face the situation of not knowing what to do with these prisoners. We will have 2,000 prisoners sitting there in idleness, and the State will lose the revenue from the sale of its cotton. If we cannot keep them on this farm we will have to build penitentiary walls again, probably at a cost of $2,000,000 or more. The raising of cotton is the thing they know best how to do.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We have the same situation in Minnesota, only in reverse. We have a large factory there in which we have invested millions of dollars, which would be useless if section 20 is to remain in the bill and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL], and an amendment which I have pending at the desk, are not adopted. Will it be necessary for the Members from Arkansas to vote down the whole Barden amendment or bill if the situation is not corrected as we from Minnesota will have to do?

Mr. TERRY. The Norton bill and the Barden bill both contain the same provision.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the gentleman advise as to what is the proportion of the present prison population that is out on this farm? You do have prisons, do you not?

Mr. TERRY. We have some prisoners that are not on the farm, but very few.

Mr. KEEFE. What is the proportion confined in institutions?

Mr. TERRY. It is extremely small. The State program is to use all prisoners on the State farms as far as possible. Probably over 90 percent are used on the farms.

Mr. Chairman, we will have a serious situation unless the Norrell amendment is agreed to. Someone said a while ago that if the State does not get this cotton quota it will go to other farms. The State with its 25,000 acres of cotton land gets its quota and complies with all the regulations under the A. A. A., and if Arkansas is compelled to abandon the use of this land for the growing of cotton that quota will not go to any other farmer.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Norrell amendment be agreed to.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, as a friend of labor, let me call attention to a little of the background concerning the serious situation that we have before us. I was a member of the legislature that helped arrive at the prison reform which we now have in Arkansas. The gentlemen from Arkansas, Mr. TERRY, Mr. GATHINGS, Mr. KITCHENS, and Mr. NORRELL, were also members of the legislature when this took place. The system is being constantly perfected.

Mr. Chairman, experts on prison reform came before our committees and reminded us that back yonder in the early days in England people were put to death on being convicted of grand larceny. They reminded us that people were burned at the stake, even in the early days of this country. They reminded us of the prison walls all over this country. They told us that the trend is away from prison walls. They told us that the trend is away from setting up factories within the penitentiaries to produce goods in competition with labor. They advised us to do something along the line of what we did. We thought we were taking a great liberal step, we thought we were setting up a new era in penitentiaries in this country, and we still believe it. We went out there on those wide plains and purchased land. We did not build even a fence around that land. We constructed buildings on the land, in which 95 percent of our prisoners are today housed when they are not in the fields at work. These buildings are not barred. A prisoner in the Arkansas Penitentiary never sees a bar unless he violates the prison regulations. Surely no one can object to this amendment being adopted in order that Arkansas and other Southern States may continue their present humane treatment of prisoners.

Mr. THOMAS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMAS of Texas. I should like to make the observation that it is my opinion that during the discussion of this bill it was not the intention of the committee to have this particular amendment apply to agricultural products, and certainly the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas ought to be adopted.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIS. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. The statement of the gentleman from Texas is absolutely correct. This is just one of those things that come up. There is no disposition on my part, certainly, as author of this substitute amendment, to resist the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. ELLIS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DUNN. Did I correctly understand the gentleman to say the chain-gang system has been abolished in Arkansas?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, indeed.

Mr. DUNN. Then the gentleman's amendment should be adopted.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I wish to say to the gentleman from Arkansas that, as far as I personally am concerned, I am for his amendment.

Mr. ELLIS. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it appearing that everybody is for the amendment now, I yield the floor. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NORRELL) there were—ayes 90, noes 27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the so-called Barden bill, the substitute, will be taken up section by section, and Members who have amendments to offer to each particular section will rise when the announcement is made that that section is available for amendment.

Are there any amendments to section 1?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the Chairman make clear to me exactly what section he is talking about?

The CHAIRMAN. We are taking the so-called Barden bill section by section, and amendments are in order now to section 1 of the substitute.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Is not that the section we have just competed?

The CHAIRMAN. No; we have not completed any section. The prior amendment to the substitute was offered before the unanimous-consent agreement was made.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHENS: On page 1, before line 3, insert the following new section:

"SECTION 1. Section 3 (m) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended to read as follows:

"'(m) Wage paid to any employee may include a reasonable charge, as determined by the Administrator, for the furnishing to such employee of board, lodging, or other facilities.'"

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is designed to amend section 3 (m) of the act so that the minimum wages payable to employees under the act may include a reasonable charge, as determined by the Administrator, for furnishing to such employees board, lodging, or other facilities, when these are furnished to the employees in addition to a cash wage. The regulations issued by the Administrator under section 3 (m) of the act, are impossible of compliance. According to these regulations, an employer is required to ascertain actual cost to him of furnishing an employee with a house or with a sack of flour or some other commodity. It is impossible to determine the specific cost of providing and selling a particular item to a particular customer. Yet the regulations issued by the Administrator seem to require this in the case of an employer who operates a company store. As now interpreted, there is doubt as to the validity of this provision or regulation. It is proposed that it be changed to permit a reasonable charge for such services and facilities as the employer may furnish to his employees.

I think the amendment speaks for itself. I know that some employers may use it, or try to use it, as a subterfuge through which to make excessive charges for such things as a house, but I want to say that most employers are honest, and this charge would be subject to the regulation and investigation of the Administrator, and the amendment so provides.

In my home town we have a little factory manufacturing broadcloth for shirting. The company furnishes the employees the little homes such as the employer can buy or build, and there is given to each of them an acre of ground; also is given them, practically at cost, if not at cost, electricity, water, and gas. Without being permitted to make a reasonable charge for the services rendered and facilities furnished, in connection with the wage paid, the small employer is unable to get by, and such services and facilities will be discontinued. In other words, the little sawmill operator, for example, should be allowed to run a company store. If a man comes into the store and buys for cash, he pays a profit on what he buys, but if he has a charge account, the employer cannot charge anything other than the actual cost of the goods. Yet this employee can go over to his neighbor and that neighbor will charge him a reasonable profit on the cost of the goods in his store. I say that the employer should be permitted to have the same privilege and make a reasonable charge for his goods in order to compete with others in the community. [Applause.]

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield so that I may propound an inquiry to the gentleman who offered this amendment [Mr. KITCHENS].

Mr. BOLLES. Not out of my time—well, go ahead.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. May I ask the gentleman who offered the amendment if that language is not already in the law?

Mr. KITCHENS. Not as I understand it.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. The law as written now states that the wage paid to any employee includes reasonable cost as determined by the Administrator to the employer of furnishing such employee with board, lodging, and other facilities.

Mr. KITCHENS. There is the trouble. The Administrator says that if he makes any such charges he cannot include any profit, but if he goes in and pays the cash, then he can charge a profit, but that is provided he pays the cash instead of having it charged. That is the difference and the object of this amendment is to cure a misinterpretation of what Congress intended.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further.

Mr. Chairman, the wage-hour law as passed in 1938, and as it stands today, has worked severe hardships on the American farmer in that it has tended to widen the disparity of income between agriculture and industry. However, even more important is the outlook for the welfare of our farmers in the future, if the wage-hour law is not amended.

The existing law now provides for a maximum of 42 hours per week and a minimum wage of 30 cents per hour. In 5 more years the minimum-wage requirement will be advanced to 40 cents per hour, and effective October 1940 the maximum hours will be reduced to 40. The wage-hour law as now interpreted by the Administrator covers practically all agricultural marketing and processing operations. This has occurred primarily because of very narrow definitions given to language contained in the act which supposedly qualify wage-hour exemptions for employees engaged in such operations. One of such regulations is that defining "area of production." The Wage-Hour Administrator has defined the "area of production" in such a way that in actual operation it has meant that virtually none of the agricultural operations is exempt except those on the farm. For example, the Administrator says that before a butter plant—and we have plenty of them in Wisconsin—can be exempt from minimum-wages provisions, it must, first, not have more than 7 employees; second, not be located in a town of more than 2,500; third, not receive any of its cream from more than 10 miles away. This would likewise be true as to the maximum-hours provisions of the law where the Wage-Hour Administrator delimits the application of the term "first processing" with respect to dairy products. Now, before it can qualify for the exemption it must comply with all three of these requirements. Any dairyman knows that there would be practically no dairy plants that could qualify for exemption under these rules. I could count the number of plants in Wisconsin that would be exempted on the fingers of my own hands.

And so the alleged exemptions extended to agriculture in the wage-hour law that we hear so much about really do not exist. My fundamental objection to the present wage-hour law is that it hits the farmer from two directions at the same time. On the one hand, it increases the price of the things he must buy, and on the other side of the ledger it reduces the price of the things he has to sell. The Barden bill, as I believe Congress intended when it passed the wage-hour law, merely takes away one of these burdens imposed upon the farmer by exempting certain agricultural marketing and processing operations.

The hours provision of the wage-hour law inflicts the greatest burden upon agriculture, because it provides for time and one-half for overtime, not at the minimum wage but at the regular rate of pay which the employee is receiving. For example, if the regular wage of an employee in a butter plant is 50 cents per hour and he works 50 hours per week instead of the maximum of 42 hours, he would be paid 75 cents per hour for the extra 8 hours. I know that the average number of hours worked in butter and cheese plants in 1939 was at least 50 hours per week, and many of them worked 65 hours per week.

I know a lot of farmers who work 80 hours per week, or 38 hours more than the present maximum in the wage-hour law. But I have never heard of any legislation proposing to give them time and one-half for overtime.

You have all heard the war cry of the opponents of the Barden bill. They say that increased wages and shorter hours will improve domestic demand for farm products, so that the farmer will actually gain instead of lose. I do not claim to be an economist, but I do like to believe that I still have a little common horse sense.

In the first place, it is certainly obvious that if labor is to get higher wages and to work shorter hours, the money to accomplish this end must be secured from some place. In marketing and processing operations it can come only from three sources: First, the employer; second, the consumer; and, third, the farmer; and I will give any of you just one guess as to which one of these will foot the bill. The extra cost will be passed back to the farmer. The employer will not absorb it and the consumer will not bear the burden, because in most cases the unit retail price is in even cents, thus preventing fractional mark-ups. The farmer will pay the bill because fundamentally he must sell his products at what buyers are willing to pay, and not necessarily at what the farmer is willing to sell.

Any fair-minded person must certainly admit that the extra money needed for higher wages and shorter hours in marketing and processing of agricultural products must be borne by the farmers producing these commodities.

Let us see if the farmer is repaid by improved demand from the recipients of this extra money. It is, of course, quite obvious that if farmers gave marketing and processing employees, let us say, a million dollars through higher wages and shorter hours that the purchasing power of these employees would be improved by a million dollars. But even if these employees spent all of this extra money which they received as a gift from farmers for agricultural products, the American farmer would still be in the position of giving, gratis, $1,000,000 worth of agricultural products to employees marketing and processing his products. The premise that farmers can help themselves by giving purchasing power to industrial groups is as much of a fallacy as pulling yourself up by your own bootstraps.

Opponents of the Barden bill say that agricultural prosperity is dependent upon industrial pay rolls and consumer buying power. Well, we all know that history has proven that industrial prosperity is really dependent upon agricultural instead of the other way around. However, it is, of course, a fact that increased industrial pay rolls do help the farmer; but if the farmer must first dig down into his own pocket to pay for the increase in industrial pay rolls, how in the name of common sense can he gain?

Industrial pay rolls and industrial wages or rates of pay are, of course, two different things. The wage-hour bill will no doubt increase the average rates of wages, but not necessarily total pay rolls. So let us see what relation wage rates have to prices of agricultural products. I have some figures from the Bureau of the Census on manufactured dairy products. I find that wages in dairy-manufacturing plants from 1910–14 to 1922 increased 85 percent, but wholesale prices of manufacturing dairy products had only increased 40 percent, or less than one-half as much. However, that is not all. From 1929 to 1933 wages in dairy-manufacturing plants declined 26 percent, but wholesale prices of manufactured dairy products dropped 50 percent, or almost twice as much. If we use the period of 1910–14 as a base, and let wages in dairy plants and wholesale prices of dairy products equal 100 during that period, we find that by 1921 wholesale prices were only 75 percent of wages, and that ever since 1921 wage rates have been considerably higher than wholesale prices. In 1937 the wage index stood at 160, but the dairy farmer producing manufactured dairy products, of which my own State is a leader, was laboring with an index of 109, or 32 percent less than the wage earner. From 1937 to 1939 wholesale prices of manufactured dairy products declined 22 percent; and, while actual figures are not available, I know that wage rates in dairy plants have not declined since 1937. At the present time it is estimated that wholesale prices of dairy manufactured products are at least 40 percent below wage rates in dairy-manufacturing plants when compared with 1910–14.

As long as agriculture is below parity when compared with industry, I fail to see how anyone could conceivably endorse the present wage-hour law and not support the Barden amendment. In 1910–14 the average income per capita of all nonagricultural persons was $411 per year, while the per capita income of all persons on farms was $156, or a difference of $255. In 1939 the per capita income of nonfarm persons had increased to $642, while the per capita income of farm persons had increased to $194, or $448 per person less than nonfarmers. In brief, the spread between per capita income of farmers and industrial persons has increased from $255 to $448, or 76 percent since 1910–14. The wage-hour law as it now is administered will tend to widen instead of narrow this spread. I, for one, do not want to be a party to any such policy.

In closing I wish to point out that the dairymen represent a most important group of farmers who are being penalized by the wage-hour law, to which the Barden bill will give relief. There are well over two and one-half million dairy farmers in this country who are directly dependent upon the sale of dairy products for their livelihood. In 1939, the dairy farmers in this country received $1,355,000,000 in cash farm income from the sale of dairy products representing almost 20 percent of the total agricultural cash income. According to the last census, the investment of dairy farmers in land, buildings, and machinery in the United States was about six and one-half billion dollars, of which about one and one-half billion was invested in dairy farms in my own State. These figures only include dairy farmers receiving 40 percent or more of their income from dairy products. On January 1, 1940, there were 25,334,000 dairy cows on farms in the United States. In my own State there were 2,223,000 dairy cows, representing an investment of about $158,000,000. In 1937 the dairy farmers in my State received about $170,000,000 from the sale of dairy products.

Wisconsin produces 10 times as much cheese as the next highest producing State. Out of a United States production of about 480,000,000 pounds of American or Cheddar cheese, Wisconsin produces about 240,000,000 pounds, or almost one-half of the total. She accounts for about 10 percent of the United States butter production. About 60 percent of Wisconsin's butter and about 30 percent of her cheese are made by farmers' cooperative associations. In 1937 the manufactured value of Wisconsin cheese and butter amounted to about $120,000,000.

The Census Bureau reported in 1937 that Wisconsin had 2,179 butter- and cheese-making establishments, employing 3,661 wage earners whose total annual wages were about three and one-half million dollars, or a little less than $1,000 per year per employee. I would like to see these employees receive more money, but I cannot bring myself to believe that these employees should be benefited at the expense of the dairy farmers in my State who are receiving prices for their products that are between 20 and 30 percent below parity. Bring these farmers up to parity, and I will be ready to help labor.

There are almost 1,000,000 men, women, and children living on farms in my State, all of whom are dependent upon the fruits of agriculture for their well-being and happiness. I am a friend of labor, but until I can satisfy myself that the farmer is getting his equitable share of the Nation's income, I will never vote for any wage-hour legislation that lets the farmer pay the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, subsection (h) of section 3 of the present law provides this definition of the word "wage":

> Wage paid to any employee includes the reasonable cost as determined by the Administrator to the employer of furnishing such employee with board, lodging, or other facilities—

And so forth. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas states that the wage paid to any employee may include a reasonable charge determined by the Administrator for the furnishing of such employee with board. The difference between the present law and the amendment, as I understand it, is that under the present law the charge is limited to the actual cost and under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas the employer would be permitted to charge more than cost if it were a reasonable charge as determined by the Administrator. I do not see, personally, why an employer should be permitted to charge, more than the cost of board or lodging, if he undertakes to furnish them to an employee, and I hope the Committee will reject the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any further amendment to section 1? Is there any amendment proposed to be offered to section 2?

Mr. BARTON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. BARTON of New York to the Barden substitute: Page 3, line 3, after "SEC. 2", insert "(a)", and after line 12, insert:
> "(b) Section 6 (a) of such act is amended by adding paragraph 5 at the end thereof, to read as follows:
> "'(5) If such employee is a home worker in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, not less than the minimum piece rate prescribed by regulation or order; or, if no such minimum piece rate is in effect, any piece rate adopted by such employer which shall yield, to the proportion or class of employees prescribed by regulation or order, not less than the applicable minimum hourly wage rate. Such minimum piece rates or employer piece rates shall be commensurate with, and shall be paid in lieu of, the minimum hourly wage rate applicable under the provisions of this section. The Administrator, or his authorized representative, shall have power to make such regulations or orders as are necessary or appropriate to carry out any of the provisions of this paragraph, including the power without limiting the generality of the foregoing, to define any operation or occupation which is performed by such home-work employees in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands; to establish minimum piece rates for any operation or occupation so defined; to prescribe the method and procedure for ascertaining and promulgating minimum piece rates and to prescribe standards for employer piece rates, the proportion or class of employees who shall receive not less than the minimum hourly wage rate; and to define the term "home worker."'"

Mr. BARTON of New York. Mr. Chairman, this long amendment simply gives the Administrator power to fix piece rates in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands commensurate with the hourly rates where workers are paid by hourly rates. A large proportion of the workers there are on a piece-rate basis, and the amendment was drawn up in conference with the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Act and, I believe, has the approval of the committee.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON of New York. I yield.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. The gentleman states it was drawn up with the approval of the Administrator. As I understand it, this is amending section 6, on page 3, of the bill H. R. 7133.

Mr. BARTON of New York. That is right; yes. It applies only to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. The gentleman understands that the provision, as contained in H. R. 7133, is the same that is in the Ramspeck bill and in the committee bill?

Mr. BARTON of New York. I understand.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Is this an amendment that meets with the approval of the Wage and Hour Administrator and the Labor Committee, as well as the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico?

Mr. BARTON of New York. I do not know about the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico. I know that the Administrator says that if we adopt the amendment as set forth, either in the gentleman's bill or in the committee bill, there should be provision for the fixing of piece rates, as well as of hourly rates.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. If that is what it does, then I am in favor of it.

Mr. BARTON of New York. That is what it does; yes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON of New York. I yield.

Mr. COX. Did not the prior Administrator put together the language contained in the three bills which the gentleman is now seeking to amend?

Mr. BARTON of New York. I did not get that.

Mr. COX. Did not the Administrator who preceded the one now in control put together the language which is contained in the three bills—the Norton bill, the Ramspeck bill, and the Barden bill—which you now again, under the suggestion of the Administrator, propose to amend?

Mr. BARTON of New York. I cannot answer that question. I think that should be answered by the chairman of the committee or the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] or the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

Mrs. NORTON. If the gentleman will yield, I will be pleased to answer that.

Mr. BARTON of New York. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. I will say that is not true.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON of New York. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The gentleman's amendment applies only to workers who are paid on a piece-work basis. Is not that correct?

Mr. BARTON of New York. That is correct.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. It does not protect, however, those workers who are now engaged in the processing of sugar in Puerto Rico where an agreement has been entered into between the union and the producers of sugar.

Mr. BARTON of New York. No.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. And the agreement that was made provided that the rate of wages established under the Fair Labor Standards Act shall be paid by the corporations until such time as this Labor Standards Act is amended. So that the Puerto Rico amendment in both the Norton and Barden bills virtually destroys the rate of pay which has been established by an agreement between the sugar corporations and the workers in Puerto Rico. That explains the real reason behind the exemption of Puerto Rican workers from the protection of the wage and hour law. It means a return to the lower wages for Puerto Rican workers.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a correction?

Mr. BARTON of New York. Yes.

Mrs. NORTON. I came in after your amendment had been read and did not clearly understand the question the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] put to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON]. I rise to say now that it is my understanding that the Administrator did agree to this amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTON of New York. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. To what industries in Puerto Rico will this piece-rate proposition apply. Is it intended specifically for needlework.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Needlework, and whatever else is done on a piece-work basis. It does not specify.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Has the gentleman from New York any detailed information from the Administrator who I understand promoted this amendment saying to what industry he says this will apply?

Mr. BARTON of New York. No, I have no further information on that except that the Administrator says that a large proportion of industry there is carried on on a piece-work basis, and that if we are to make the Puerto Rican amendment effective, he has to have the right to fix the piece-work wage and hour commensurate with what the bill carries.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The amendment in the bill does not deal with piece work.

Mr. BARTON of New York. It does not specifically cover piece work.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. And this is to make it do for that particular work what the industrial provisions of the law will do on an industrial basis.

Mr. BARTON of New York. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat surprised to hear the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAWKS] rise here in defense of canning factories in his State that employ mothers and high-school children and use that as an argument for their exemption from the wage-hour law. I was greatly surprised in view of the fact that the State of Wisconsin has always been one of the foremost progressive States in the Union. As I remember, it was Wisconsin, under the great progressive leader, the late Bob La Follette, that first adopted minimum-wage provisions and workmen's compensation laws. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAWKS] has gone a long way from that when when he here asks us to exempt canning factories because they employ mothers and high-school children.

I do not know what that gentleman's conception of a living wage is, but it varies a great deal from the conception of the living wage which I quote here from a statement of the archbishops and bishops of the administrative board of the National Catholic Welfare Conference. That says:

> A wage so low that it must be supplemented by the wage of the wife and mother or by the children of a family before it can provide adequate food, clothing, and shelter, together with essential spiritual and cultural needs, cannot be regarded as a living wage.

With that statement I am in entire agreement.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I grew up on a farm, and I would like to have the gentleman give an interpretation of that ruling with reference to the children at work on the farms with their parents not only in this country but in every agricultural area on earth, not only now but as long as people drew their living from the farm.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I did not yield for a speech. I yielded for a question.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have asked the question.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. And my answer is that it has nothing to do with what we are discussing. We are discussing the wage and hour question and not farm labor. Farm labor is already exempt from the act, whether the laborer be employed by the farmer on the farm or off the farm, and I cannot see the relevancy of such a question. I am talking now about a man who wants an exemption for canning factories because they employ mothers and high-school children.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I do not yield further. The argument has been advanced here in favor of the Barden bill that you have to give these exemptions because if you do not it will hurt agriculture. I cannot follow that logic. Not a single man has risen on this floor and shown what the cost will be to agriculture to maintain in all of these industries the 30-cents-per-hour minimum. No man has specifically pointed that out. I yield if you can point out what it will be.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I will be glad to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Good.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Now we pay the 30-cent minimum, but where the shoe pinches up in our section is that when men receive more than that they are required to pay time and a half for overtime on the rates that are paid. I can point out scores of industries where they pay $100 and $125 for 48 hours a week, where they are now compelled to pay time and a half for overtime, and they cannot do it.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I can see the merit in the gentleman's contention with respect to time and a half, but I am trying particularly to address myself to the 30-cent minimum.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Yes; I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAWKS. I do not know whether the gentleman heard it or not, but I pointed out at the end of my short talk that we were paying well above the 30-cent minimum in our State.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Then you do not want a minimum-wage exemption there?

Mr. HAWKS. The wage has nothing to do with us.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I am glad to see we have such unanimity of opinion with respect to wages. The Barden amendments which I oppose have for their primary purpose exempting over a million employees from the minimum-wage provision of 30 cents per hour.

I cannot see where it will hurt the farmer any if this minimum wage is maintained. On the contrary, it will hurt him most severely if it is not. The farmer is a producer, he must find a market. His present difficulty is due to the fact that he cannot find a market for what he produces. His greatest loss is the loss of that part of the American market made up of substandard wage earners. Milo Perkins, who is head of the Surplus Commodities Corporation, says that two-thirds of the city families of America receive an income less than $100 a month. He estimates that if those families could be brought up to $100 a month the farmers would be the gainer by over a billion dollars a year.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Not now. I am trying to develop this point. In other words, the man who has the greatest stake in the world to bring up wages is the farmer, and he should not be represented here as wishing to reduce the minimum wage to less than 30 cents per hour.

We know that low-income people are eating about half as much as they need and want. They will buy more food and greater varieties if they have the opportunity.

The farmer's real stake is in the bottom two-thirds of our city families who are fighting for an income of $100 a month on which to exist. That is his greatest potential market, and it is right here at home. The overstuffed third at the top has enough to eat anyway.

The industries that would be exempt by the Barden bill employ over a million wage earners who are the lowest-paid workers in the United States. You representatives of the farmers cut them to starvation wages and you deprive the farmer of that market. But wait, more than that, you open up the gates for more exemptions, and even more than that, you prevent other businesses, by allowing unfair cutthroat competition, from paying a living wage to their employees.

The farmers are being misled. They will soon think for themselves and see that the wage and hour law is and will be of more aid to them than the so-called agricultural aid bills.

The opposition of farmers' representatives to it is senseless and unwarranted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTON of New York), there were—ayes 72, noes none.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment to section 2.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUDLOW to the substitute amendment offered by Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina: On page 3, after line 12, insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 3. Section 7 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended in paragraph (2) by striking out the words 'two thousand' and substituting the words 'two thousand two hundred'."

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, this is rather an important amendment and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes, making 8 minutes altogether.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. McKEOUGH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I merely want to call attention to the fact that by reason of the arrangement made we will probably be accepting amendments here until well into the night; particularly so if we are going to allow additional time to be granted to those offering amendments as the bill is read by sections. I will therefore have to object, with the view of trying to get this business out of the way.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offer would not in any way weaken or cripple the wage and hour law but would strengthen and improve it by ironing out what appears to have been clearly an error in the original enactment.

The law as in operation at present fixes a ceiling of 2,184 hours annually on the total number of hours an employee may work without any guaranties as to continuous employment. On October 24, 1940, the ceiling will become 2,080 hours. Bear in mind that under any sort of a haphazard arrangement, without any assurance that his work will continue, the employee may work that number of hours per year.

But if he enters into an annual voluntary wage agreement with his employer for 1 year's continued uninterrupted service he is allowed to work only 2,000 hours a year.

Certainly these constant wage and employment agreements are in the interest of the employee as well as the employer, and certainly they are in the general public interest because they contribute to the stability of society and the general feeling of security and contentment that is so much to be longed for, especially in this time of social unrest and economic insecurity.

That being the case, why penalize the employee who desires to enter into a voluntary constant wage and employment agreement? Why reduce his annual income—for that is what it amounts to—below the possible income of his fellow worker who has no assurance as to constancy of employment?

Is it not in the interest of society to encourage these constant wage and employment agreements and to make the differential in favor not of the haphazard employee but of the employee who has the foresight and constancy to enter into a continuous-employment agreement? Surely it is.

The amendment I offer would merely substitute the figures 2,200 in section 7 (b), paragraph 11, subparagraph 2, of the Fair Labor Standards Act in place of the figures 2,000, so that the employee under these voluntary constant wage agreements "shall not be employed more than 2,200 hours during any period of 52 consecutive weeks." This amendment would improve and strengthen the Fair Labor Standards Act and would operate to the general stability of the industrial situation and the benefit of society. It would give the faithful employee an incentive by enabling him to earn a little more annually as a reward for his constancy.

It has been estimated that if the act were amended as herein suggested that in a reasonable length of time several million employees in this country would be working under annual constant wage and employment agreements that would guarantee constant employment and wages for at least a period of 52 consecutive weeks. Would not every employee or individual rather be assured of continuous employment or a definite income over a period of 52 weeks rather than go on from day to day or week to week not knowing what he or she may earn? Is it not to the interest of the American people to encourage both employers and employees to enter into constant wage and employment agreements? Would not this be in keeping with the intent of Congress in the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938?

If this is correct, then should not the present Congress amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, section 7 (b), paragraph 11, pertaining to voluntary constant wage and employment agreements, so that this paragraph would read—"the employee shall not be employed more than 2,200 hours during any period of 52 consecutive weeks." I hope the committee will adopt the amendment.

I submit that this proposed amendment should commend itself to all friends of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, during all the discussions thus far the remarks which amused me most were those by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK]. They always told me when I went to school that when the eye is deceptive the way to tell whether or not two lines are parallel is to prolong them, and if they are not parallel they will cross and thereafter become farther apart. If they are parallel, of course, they will run around the world without getting any closer together or farther apart. To see if an argument is logical prolong it a little.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] said, in substance, that the processing did not affect the pocketbook of the farmer. That was the substance of his remarks. Let us prolong that a little bit. If 30 cents an hour did not affect the price for the crating of Georgia peaches, would $2.30 an hour affect the price or the consumer consumption? Then you see it could be too high. If it could be too high, then the question is at least debatable, "It it too high?"

I remember quite well that we get our first watermelons from Georgia. Sometimes they are one price in a season and sometimes another. Would he say that the price of packing and assembling at the central depot and the handling, crating, and trucking to Kentucky did not affect the price to the consumer? I have seen them rush into the market and look them over and when the chain-store man told them the price, they would all walk away but one or two fellows, who happened to have the most money. Then the processing did make a change, not only in the value but in the volume consumed. If the gentleman's philosophy is correct, then all the bankers and all the expert businessmen and economists of the country have been wrong all the time in trying to fight off every form of higher transportation, every form of overcharging for processing, every form of intermediary tax to bring their goods to the consumer. It is all wrong on the part of the businessman if this is wrong on the part of the farmer.

For the past 20 years every time I read a controversy, whether in Michigan or Florida, between labor and capital, my first impulse, until I knew more about it, was to be for labor. I assumed that they had made the proper investigations, that capital had sufficient surplus or sufficient dividends to pay more—and most generally that assumption was right. But here my overenthusiastic labor friends who see nothing but labor, here is where you are making your mistake. You regard the farmer as a capitalist. There is where your viewpoint is wrong. If the farmer himself is not a laborer amongst laborers where are you going to find one? You must remember that God Almighty made the country and let it run for several thousands of years that way. Farm labor was the first labor. Man made cities several years afterward and then organized some labor. So the farmer himself, if you will follow him from the time he gets up to the time he quits must be considered a laborer. If you do not believe he is, then do his work and tell me what you think.

If there is a dispute in an industrial plant where assembly men and piece workers and other groups say they are not getting their fair share in comparison with others in the same plant, a different situation is presented. In such case I am for giving the lower-paid group its fair share of the wages. But here you are dealing with one set of laborers taking toll from another in the same class. At the end of the year a great many farmers find that the year's work has not brought them the minimum wage under this law.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, other Members have had extensions. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Mr. Chairman, for reasons which I have heretofore advanced, I must object to this request as I have to others.

Mr. CREAL. For the reason that the gentleman does not like the line of the argument?

Mr. McKEOUGH. Because I want to get along.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCK to the substitute amendment offered by Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina: On page 3, after line 12, insert a new section, to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. (f) 'Agriculture' includes farming in all its branches and includes all service performed—

"(1) On a farm, in the employ of any person, in connection with cultivating the soil or in connection with raising or harvesting any agricultural or horticultural commodity, including the raising, shearing, feeding, caring for, training, and management of livestock, bees, poultry, and fur-bearing animals and wildlife.

"(2) In the employ of the owner or tenant or other operator of a farm, in connection with the operation, management, conservation, improvement, or maintenance of such farm and its tools and equipment, or in salvaging timber or clearing land of brush and other debris left by a hurricane, if the major part of such service is performed on a farm.

"(3) In connection with the production or harvesting of maple sirup or maple sugar or any commodity defined as an agricultural commodity in section 15 (g) of the Agricultural Marketing Act, as amended, or in connection with the raising or harvesting of mushrooms, or in connection with the hatching of poultry, or in connection with the ginning of cotton, or in connection with the operation or maintenance of ditches, canals, reservoirs, or waterways used exclusively for supplying and storing water for farming purposes.

"(4) In handling, planting, drying, packing, packaging, processing, freezing, grading, storing, or delivering to storage or to market or to a carrier for transportation to market, any agricultural or horticultual commodity; but only if such service is performed as an incident to ordinary farming operations or, in the case of fruits and vegetables, as an incident to the preparation of such fruits or vegetables for market. The provisions of this paragraph shall not be deemed to be applicable with respect to service performed in connection with commercial canning or commercial freezing or in connection with any agricultural or horticultural commodity after its delivery to a terminal market for distribution for consumption.

"As used in this subsection, the term 'farm' includes stock, dairy, poultry, fruit, fur-bearing-animal, and truck farms, plantations, ranches, nurseries, ranges, greenhouses, or other similar structures used primarily for the raising of agricultural or horticultural commodities, and orchards."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I hate to intrude myself so frequently, but this measure has been under consideration since last week. Several Members will be required to leave the city within the next 24 hours. Because of this, I must object.

Mr. BUCK. I asked for the additional time in order that I might answer questions that are going to be asked by those who oppose the amendment. In objecting to my having this extra time, the gentleman hurts only those who are opposed to the amendment.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Before the gentleman has used his 5 minutes, he may have been able to answer the questions. I must object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The gentleman from California is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, as I stated on Friday afternoon, this amendment proposes to write into the Wages and Hours Act the language which has been adopted by the House and the Senate, and approved by the President, in defining agricultural labor in the Social Security Act. The farmer now must adapt his practices to agriculture as it is defined under that act, as it is defined under the Wage and Hour Act, and as defined under the National Labor Relations Act, and the rules and regulations issued under all three. We had the same trouble about administrative rulings under the Social Security Act before it was amended. Farmers have complained under the Wage and Hour Act. It is only a fair and reasonable proposition that once the Congress has set up a standard in one of these acts it ought to adopt the same standard in the other acts under which the farmer has to operate.

Agricultural labor is exempt under the wage and hour law as it stands at present. It is exempt under section 13 (a) subparagraph (6). But agriculture is defined in section 3 (f) in a very meager manner. Rulings are entirely possible, and have been made, under section 3 (f), which show that agricultural labor under one circumstance will come within the act and others will not.

I hesitate to speak of myself. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] the other day said it was bad taste, but I shall have to indulge in some bad taste, then. I am a farmer, a fruit producer. I own sufficient acreage so that I maintain my own packing house, and by packing I do not mean one of these meat-packing plants, I mean a shed in which fresh fruits and vegetables are placed in crates so they may be transported to market in their raw or unprocessed state. I do not come within the Wage and Hour Act because that work is performed on my farm. But I have 10, 20, or maybe more neighbors who own small farms of the same kind. They form a cooperative, build a shed down by the railroad track, and do the same work, and many times use the same people a little bit later or a little earlier than I employ them, yet my neighbors come within the purview of the Wage and Hour Act. This is one of the things this amendment is aimed to prevent, discrimination against the small producer, against the small farmer.

I want to remind the chairman and the members of the Committee on Labor that the Wage and Hour Act never would have passed the House had it not been that not one like myself but dozens who are farmers and who are interested in agricultural labor believed that when you put the exemption in exempting agricultural labor that it meant what it said. I concede that the gentlewoman from New Jersey meant it, but the Wage and Hour Administration has never made proper rulings in connection with agricultural labor.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. NORTON. Is it not true this takes in all the California cooperatives?

Mr. BUCK. I think it would take in all the cooperatives, provided they were engaged in the normal preparation of fruits, and so forth, for market. I do not mean by that canning. There is a specific statement in the amendment that it does not apply to commercial canning or commercial freezing, or to the handling of any agricultural or horticultural commodity after it reaches the prepared state or after it reaches a terminal point for distribution for consumption.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Just what processing would the gentleman's amendment cover?

Mr. BUCK. Let us take pears. The Pure Food and Drugs Act and regulations thereunder require pears and apples to be washed so that they may be free of spray residue. That is processing. I might be growing apples, as does a Member of the other body, and enough of them so that I can afford to maintain my own equipment; but my neighbors cannot. They must meet somewhere and join together somewhere in order to process their pears.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. The purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to protect his neighbors and put them in a position to compete with him in the market?

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman states the embarrasing position I am in, or any other person might be in when he puts all the burden on his neighbors and exempts himself.

Mr. MAY. I think the gentleman is trying to protect his neighbors.

Mr. BUCK. I certainly am.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEALEY. Has the gentleman any figures to show how many people will be exempted if his amendment is adopted?

Mr. BUCK. No; I have not, but I may say there will be nothing like the number exempted if this amendment is agreed to that will be exempted if the Barden amendments to section 13 are adopted, because this specifically refuses to exempt employees in canning and freezing operations and also those engaged in terminal operations.

Mr. HEALEY. I take it the gentleman would not go as far as the Barden amendment in exempting processing plants?

Mr. BUCK. I may say to the gentleman that my amendment is very strictly and solely in the interest of agriculture itself. A few minutes ago the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] stated that there was a straightforward way to act, and that way was to come in and define what agriculture wanted. Now, this is what agriculture wants. This language was presented to the Ways and Means Committee a year ago in connection with the social-security amendment. The legislative counsel and the Bureau of Internal Revenue worked with me and other members of the committee for several weeks to develop the language finally enacted into law. The Bureau of Internal Revenue has found this to be a workable amendment.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. As I understand the gentleman, this is to be substituted for or take the place of the present definition of agriculture?

Mr. BUCK. Yes; this would amend section 3 (f) to read as the Clerk has reported my amendment.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. It contains a definition of agriculture?

Mr. BUCK. It contains a definition of agriculture which I think is comprehensive and yet does not trespass in any way on industrial operations connected with the processing of agricultural crops.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Is not the main difference between your suggested definition of agriculture and the present definition in the law the fact that the present definition in the law says "performed by a farmer on a farm"?

Mr. BUCK. That is one of the differences, but there is another difference in there that I pointed out a minute ago and on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] commented. That is, my neighbors who do the same work of packaging their fruit but off the farm somewhere come within the act, or their labor comes within the act, but mine does not.

Mr. FADDIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FADDIS. I want to congratulate the gentleman from California in his endeavor to put into a piece of legislation of this kind specific instructions from the Congress to the Board which makes it plain to the Board what the intention of the Congress is. This should be done more often.

Mr. BUCK. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman has considerable irrigation, canals, and ditches in his State. Does this amendment apply to irrigation and canals?

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman has misunderstood the language. This would not include the construction of any waterways whatsoever.

Mr. WOOD. Does it not cover waterways, canals, and ditches?

Mr. BUCK. I may say to the gentleman that there are in the West a great many districts, including my own, which are irrigated, but this does not touch public works in any way, shape, or manner.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Would this cover cooperatives that are maintained by the farmers themselves in connection with seasonable perishable products?

Mr. BUCK. It would.

Mr. DONDERO. Or would they be exempt from the operation of the law? I have a lot of cooperatives in my district maintained by the farmers themselves on seasonal crops and on perishable crops. Are they exempt?

Mr. BUCK. This amendment is designed to cover them.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. As I understand, most of this debate has been centered around these categorical paragraphs which I show the gentleman. They complain that the reason they have to have these is that the Administrator has given a narrow construction of the law. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted—and the amendment is clear, and the Administrator surely should understand what it states—what effect will it have on these paragraphs?

Mr. BUCK. Of course, that is entirely up to the Committee. I do not know. We have not come to that yet. I am offering this amendment so that we may know exactly what is the definition of agriculture.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, does not the gentleman believe a good deal of these will have to be changed?

Mr. BUCK. That is a question I cannot answer. That is up to the Committee.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. This is not an amendment to my bill as drawn; this is an amendment to the original law, taking care of the definition of agriculture.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman from North Carolina is correct. This is an amendment neither to the bill of the gentlewoman from New Jersey nor the bill of the gentleman from North Carolina; but it must be offered now, in connection with the consideration of their amendments.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Will the gentleman inform us if this is the amendment that is printed on page 5154 of last Friday's RECORD?

Mr. BUCK. That is right, if anyone wants to read it before voting on it.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. GEYER of California. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it would exempt the American Crystal Sugar Co., that owns 32,493 acres.

Mr. BUCK. They are exempt already.

Mr. GEYER of California. It would also exempt others, which I shall name if I can get recognition.

Mr. BUCK. They are exempted already, I may say to the gentleman from California, because their labor is performed on a farm. All of them are already exempted.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it the understanding of the gentleman from California that the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Act under this amendment will exempt from the application of the law, the same as the Bureau of Internal Revenue does on the Social Security taxes?

Mr. BUCK. Agriculture is exempt under the present law. If the Administrator has this amendment as a guide, his rulings should agree with the Bureau of Internal Revenue. It is my hope that they will. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry to feel constrained to rise in opposition to the amendment of my friend, whom I highly respect, and who is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, of which I am a member. However, the amendment he has offered may be misunderstood by the members of the Committee of the Whole. The amendment that the gentleman has offered is a very far-reaching one.

The gentleman advances the argument, and properly so, and unexplained it would be very effective, that the Committee on Ways and Means incorporated that provision into the bill reported out last year amending the Social Security Act, that it passed the House, passed the Senate, was signed by the President, and is now law. Of course, it was a part of a very comprehensive change made last year to the Social Security Act.

It was with a great deal of hesitancy that the members of the Committee on Ways and Means included that provision in the bill reported out last year. However, it related to a tax. It related to the taxes imposed under the Social Security Act. I, for one, felt great hesitancy in including it, and I know other members of the Committee on Ways and Means felt the same way I did about it, but in response to the strong personality of the gentleman from California, we decided that insofar as the tax was concerned, having in mind the Social Security Act, we might well err on the side of agriculture.

What does this amendment do? It exempts all farm cooperatives. This is not a question of specifically exempting five or six men employed on a farm. It is not a question of a man who has a farm with a little sawmill on it that he might lease to a friend of his who would hire five or six men. This is a question where, in some cases, several thousand men form a cooperative. I am chairman of a subcommittee conducting hearings on the Patman chain-store bill now. We have had representatives of cooperatives appear before us who testified that their membership is anywhere from 500 to 10,000. A membership of from 3,000 to 5,000 is nothing unusual in a cooperative. They finance themselves, and properly so, and I admire and respect them and encourage them in their efforts. They finance themselves to take the product from the farm. They have their own cooperative, they have their own warehouses, they have their own business management, and they have their own office force.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman is not under any impression that my amendment applies to the office force and others like that?

Mr. McCORMACK. Oh, no; of course it does not apply to the office force itself, but it takes up the greater part of the activity of a farm cooperative. The gentleman admitted it in response to questions asked by my friend on this side.

Mr. BUCK. I was asked a question whether this would not cover all cooperatives in California, or practically all of them, anyway, I believe the question was, and I said "Yes." May I say, if I have left any wrong impression in the mind of my able friend from Massachusetts, that I meant only so far as they are engaged in their local packing plants in packaging and putting the fruit and vegetables into the crates, and not insofar as they are engaged in the marketing end or anything of that kind.

Mr. McCORMACK. Here is a cooperative composed of several thousand farmers. If they formed an actual corporation and sold stock, they would be subject to the provisions of the law. Why should they not be? Instead of forming a corporation, they form a cooperative. They are in business, and it is certainly a decided step removed from farming. I voted for it in the social security. I erred on the side of being liberal against the imposition of a tax, which was a burden, to try to give them as much relief as possible; but this is a case of the employment of help and the payment of a minimum wage of 30 cents an hour, and certainly what we did on the Social Security Act should not be considered as a precedent for taking the same action in connection with legislation of this kind. I simply rose as a member of the Ways and Means Committee so that the Committee of the Whole in the consideration of this bill would have the benefit of one of the members of that committee who supported the amendment so far as the Social Security Act was concerned, but realizes that there is a wide distinction between erring on the side of relieving of taxation and erring on the side of the payment of wages of 30 cents an hour. I am opposed to the amendment. [Applause.]

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that if this amendment is adopted it will exempt child labor from the agricultural provisions of the law. Nobody knows how far this amendment goes, but it certainly broadens the present definition of agriculture.

Under section 13 (c) of the act children employed in agriculture are exempted from the prohibitions on child labor. Now when you broaden the definition of agriculture to include the multitude of processing operations carried out with respect to farm products you are legalizing child labor in connection with processing farm commodities.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I am taking this time in order to ask a question or two of the sponsor of this amendment, because if other Members of the House know as little about the far-reaching character and effect of this proposed amendment as I do, I think it is a pretty poor way to bring legislation before this House.

The gentleman made the statement that this legislation would take care of him in his fruit operations, as I understand it, and take care of his neighbors who are smaller operators than he is, and would also take care of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] in the matter of handling the apple operations over here in Virginia. Am I correct in assuming that? Is that what the gentleman meant to say?

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman from California needs no legislation to take care of his situation. He is taken care of, if that is the way you care to put it, already in the existing law. Let me say with regard to the second question you asked me, my amendment will put my small neighbors on the same basis as larger operators are now——

Mr. KEEFE. What about the small farmers who have had to form a little cooperative in order to have a little plant to do the processing that you do on your own farm? The fact of the matter is that if those little farmers are located within the area of production as defined by the Administrator today they would be exempt.

Mr. BUCK. No; they would not be exempt. The gentleman is wrong about that.

Mr. KEEFE. Why would they not be exempt?

Mr. BUCK. I will go back again and say that this amendment is designed to define what agriculture is. The area of production exemption comes under subsection 10 of section 13 (a). The subsection that my amendment applies to is subsection 6 of section 13 (a), which refers to persons employed in agriculture. My amendment has nothing to do with area of production, has nothing to do with processing exemptions that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] asked for and nothing to do with the bill that the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] submitted. It is entirely an effort to clarify and not necessarily——

Mr. KEEFE. I do not want the gentleman to go into a further speech, but let me ask a specific question. The gentleman made the statement it would not involve canning factories.

Mr. BUCK. That is right. It specifically states in the amendment, if the gentleman cares to peruse it——

Mr. KEEFE. I have perused it and that is why I am up here now. Let me ask the gentleman this further question then. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, will the canning factories in my State and in the State of Indiana and in the State of Michigan receive the same exemptions that are provided for in the Norton amendment?

Mr. BUCK. Will they receive what?

Mr. KEEFE. Will they receive the same exemptions that are provided for in the Norton amendment?

Mr. BUCK. Certainly they will, if the Norton amendment is adopted. It has not been adopted yet.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, we will put it this way. Suppose the Barden amendments are adopted with your amendment, will the canning factories in my State be involved?

Mr. BUCK. I am sorry I am so stupid in trying to get over the idea of my amendment. It is a definition of agriculture. Agriculture is exempted under the present act. I do not touch in this amendment anything in regard to the canning industry, factories, or anything of that kind whatsoever. If the gentleman will look at subdivision 4 of my amendment, he will see that in order that the amendment shall not confuse agriculture with the canning industry, we put in a specific statement that this will not apply to commercial canning or freezing. You have still to determine what you are going to do with the Barden amendment or the Norton amendment, and this is only an attempt to lay out a chart for the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division so he will know what agriculture is.

Mr. KEEFE. That is exactly the point. The gentleman is laying out a chart to define agriculture, and in his definition of agriculture, laying a chart out for the Administrator, is going to take care of his situation and the situation of people like the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], but he is going to put the pea canners in my State and in other States out on a limb and I do not propose to vote for any such amendment. I want the membership of this House to know that there is a very definite joker in this particular amendment, and they ought to understand it before they vote for it, and the people who are interested in protecting the milk and the vegetable canners, and who are not interested particularly in the first handling and packing of fruit, and that is what this takes care of, to read this amendment and they will see that what I am saying is right.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mrs. NORTON. I may say to the gentleman that the committee considered this amendment and rejected it.

Mr. KEEFE. That ought to be sufficient answer. If this amendment was submitted to the committee and rejected, there must have been some good reason for its rejection and the House should reject it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, you have heard something about factories in the field. I do not know whether my good friend and colleague from California [Mr. BUCK] knows the source of this amendment or not, but I question very much whether he would present it if he did.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment to redefine "agriculture." Now, ladies and gentlemen, it is a known fact that the prevailing wage rates in the packing of fruits and vegetables in the State of California are in excess of the minimum rates required by the Fair Labor Standards Act. And the present 14 workweeks exemption from the hour limitations is sufficient to their needs.

The question, therefore, is, Why is the Congressman from California proposing to enlarge the definition of agriculture to deprive workers from the protection of minimum wages? Ladies and gentlemen, that answer can be found only too clearly in the evidence which I am about to present to this House which has been taken from the sworn statements of witnesses who testified before the Senate Civil Liberties Committee during the last year.

This evidence shows that the now notorious organization, the Associated Farmers of California, adopted a three-point program to exclude from the benefits of the Social Security Act, the Federal wage and hour law, and the National Labor Relations Act all workers engaged in the processing, packing, and handling of agricultural commodities. While the wage and hour law was only pending in Congress at that time, a part of its program called for exemption from this legislation when enacted. This ruthless program to read this group of industrial workers out of all social legislation has been set forth in a resolution of the Associated Farmers for the last 3 years as a matter of public record and is referred to repeatedly in the testimony of the officers of the Association. See testimony of John Watson, president of the Associated Farmers of California, and Harold E. Pomeroy, executive secretary, January 17, 1940, galley pages 16 and 17 JJE.

But this evidence shows that these labor-hating industrialists of my State hate unions. They want the conditions described in Grapes of Wrath to continue. They have taken the law in their own hands so often that they are opposed to all government.

As some of you gentlemen probably do not know who the Associated Farmers are, permit me to explain the membership and policies of the group of so-called farmers and to call attention to their principal contributors. In 1939 there were 5,578 dues-paying members and about 6,000 non-dues-paying members. See exhibit 1. The best clue as to who the members are and whom they represent is shown by their contributors.

Of the $178,000 which they have collected from 1934 through 1939, 74 percent came from processors, oil companies, railroads, utilities, canners, ginning companies, sugar companies, banks, and antiunion employer associations. I wish to set forth at this time in the RECORD as exhibit 2 an exhibit which is contained in part 49 at page 18082 of the hearings held before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor under Senate Resolution 266. Half the money which was turned over to the Associated Farmers of California was raised through the officers and employees of the California Packing Corporation, the largest canning corporation in the world. See exhibit 3, taken from the Senate Civil Liberties Committee record and introduced at this point in the RECORD.

The testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Civil Liberties has clearly placed upon their shoulders the responsibility for the vigilante movements which shocked the Nation and gave rise to as much organized violence and bitterness between employers and employees as the country has ever witnessed. This organization, as the evidence shows, secretly financed by the industrial groups in Los Angeles and San Francisco, has striven to drive a breach between industrial workers in cities and working farmers in the agricultural communities. A blueprint of their program for organizing vigilante pickax-handle brigades, complete with squadrons, uniforms, and drilling, is set forth in a detailed memorandum prepared by the Associated Farmers for use in Stanislaus County. It was used to eliminate all unions among cannery workers in that county. See hearings before the Senate Civil Liberties, January 27, 1940, testimony of Fred L. Hogue, president of the Associated Farmers of Stanislaus County, and a member of the board of directors of the Associated Farmers of California. It should be added that this same organization and its supporters are also responsible for the passage of 31 county ordinances against picketing like the one which the Supreme Court recently declared unconstitutional in the case of John Carlson against people of the State of California. See testimony of Henry Fowler, chief counsel of the Senate Civil Liberties Committee, part 47, page 17213. For sponsorship of antipicketing ordinances by Associated Farmers see the testimony of John Watson, president of Associated Farmers of California, on January 27, 1940.

So we are asked now to accept an amendment originating with these farmers. Did I say "farmers"?

I include with other material information on the attempt of manufacturers to control the raw material at its source.

[Hearings, Civil Liberties Committee, San Francisco, December 14, 1939, pt. 48, p. 17474 and ff.]

EXCERPTS FROM TESTIMONY OF DR. THEODORE NORMAN

One of the most interesting features of the California agricultural scene is the extent to which it is part of an integrated system. Like the manufacturers of automobiles and steel, the shippers, canners, and refiners of California farm products also reach back to control the sources of their raw material. This is accomplished in various ways, by direct ownership and operation of farmland, by the operation of leased land, more largely through the use of contracts by which farmers agree to deliver all the produce of a certain acreage to a canner, shipper, or sugar-beet refinery.

The two chief cash crops of the [Imperial] Valley are lettuce and cantaloups and other melons. In 1936, 83.2 percent of the lettuce acreage and 84.2 percent of the cantaloup acreage in five townships in the Imperial irrigation district were controlled directly by shippers through ownership and operation under lease, or indirectly through financing and contracts for the picking, processing, and marketing of the crops.

Turning from areas to individual concerns, we can find numerous striking examples of integration. For instance, California Packing Corporation owns and operates some 20,000 acres of farmland in California, valued at nearly $9,000,000. In Illinois, Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands the corporation leases and operates 47,000 acres additional. In 1936 the corporation had contracts for delivery from 7,779 growers operating 30,917 acres; on February 29, 1936, it had outstanding $604,231 in advances to the growers under contract. Thus, to assure itself of its supplies, this corporation had control, direct or indirect, over the crops on nearly 100,000 acres in various States and possessions of the United States. To process the products of this vast area, of crops otherwise purchased, and fish, the company operates 76 plants, 50 of which are in California.

At the other end of the scale, California Packing Corporation controls the facilities for loading its products on board ships, through its subsidiary, Encinal Terminals, at Alameda, and it has an extensive sales organization with offices in the principal cities of the United States and many foreign countries.

Not only the manufacturers but the shippers of California farm products have reached back to control the sources of supply, and forward to establish sales outlets. Perhaps the most interesting example of the integrated shipping company is the Di Giorgio Fruit Corporation. Through its subsidiary, Earl Fruit Co., it owns 15,075 acres of farmland in California, which includes the 12,000 acres of vineyards mentioned above. This land was valued at about $7,000,000 and the irrigation equipment on it at $1,121,000 additional in 1937. The Earl Fruit Co. also owns land in other States, and International Fruit Corporation, another subsidiary of Di Giorgio, has large holdings in Florida. In 1935 the Di Giorgio Fruit Corporation was the largest shipper of grapes in the country, and was among the leading private shippers of oranges and grapefruit. In 1935 the Earl Fruit Co. was the second largest producer of wine in the United States.

American Fruit Growers, Inc., is another Nation-wide shipping and brokerage firm which controls a considerable amount of farm property. It owns some 15,500 acres of farm land in 10 States, of which 2,500 were planted to citrus, grapes, and vegetables in California. In 1936 this company handled 34,225 cars of fruit, of which about 9,000 cars originated in California and Arizona, where the company maintains 31 packing houses. Of this tonnage about 20 percent was grown by the company on owned or leased farms and about 50 percent more was partially financed prior to harvest, principally in the form of cash loans to growers secured by crop mortgages and marketing agreements. This company, with headquarters in Pittsburgh, has terminal sales offices in 8 large markets and has brokerage connections in other principal markets. In 1935 it was among the 3 largest private shippers of grapes, oranges, grapefruit, apples, peaches, white potatoes, and fresh tomatoes.

California's agriculture, it has been asserted, has many of the characteristics of industry. We see in instances of the sort described above that a large segment of California agriculture is but part of a larger industrial whole, and not only California agriculture but agriculture in any part of the United States where crops similar to California's are grown. The operation of these companies, it will be noticed, are Nation-wide.

TESTIMONY OF DECEMBER 20

Some years ago a great deal of production financing was being done by cotton-financing companies, which in most instances were, and are, closely affiliated with ginning and cotton-oil companies. In 1933 such finance companies refinanced loans covering 45 percent of the State's cotton acreage with the Federal Intermediate Credit Bank of Berkeley. In more recent years the financing done by these companies has declined in importance and in 1939 their production loans covered about 15 percent of the cotton acreage. * * *

TESTIMONY OF JANUARY 17

This table which I offer for the record shows that in the case of the 5,024 orange farms tabulated 197 farms over 50 acres in size—that is, 3.9 percent of the farms—had 31.8 percent of the acreage in these tabulated farms. At the other end of the scale we had 56.3 percent of the farms under 10 acres—that is, 2,827 farms—which have only 18.8 percent of the total acreage. Thus, in the case of oranges, as in the case of the other California crops studied by the economic staff of this committee, there is a considerable concentration of operation in the hands of the larger growers.

[1] According to the testimony of A. W. Eames, vice president, no campaign was conducted by the officers or employees of the California Packing Corporation to raise funds for the Associated Farmers of California in 1939. Contributions for 1939 have been listed in this table in the case of companies whose contributions over a period of years had been actively solicited by the officers and employees of the California Packing Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some charts and tables to which I have referred.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a request that must be made in the House.

Mr. GEYER of California. But these are merely the exhibits which are taken from these records, and they are a part of my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. But they are records taken from another body—another hearing. The gentleman can obtain that permission in the House.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mrs. NORTON. Then that all debate close in 5 minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentlewoman from New Jersey that all debate upon the amendment close in 5 minutes.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced itself unable to decide.

The Committee again divided; and the Chair announced—ayes 67, noes 102.

So the motion was rejected.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how many gentlemen expect to offer amendments. [After a pause.] I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, how many Members have arisen to request time?

The CHAIRMAN. That is beyond the knowledge of the Chair.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, only one Member has spoken in favor of this amendment. All of the other speakers have been against it. Certainly it is fair that those in favor of the amendment should have a fair share of the time. I will object to any limitation of debate at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW] rise?

Mr. HINSHAW. I rise in support of the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, apparently the House has the idea that this amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] has special reference to the State of California. I think the House is in error in that belief. The gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] has offered an amendment and, merely by way of example, referred to a particular situation in his own district. I think that one of the things we should consider is the business of not messing up various laws that are on our books with definitions of the same thing that do not coincide with each other. I think that is very important. Perhaps if the social-security definition of "agriculture" is wrong, that might be amended; but I understand the Ways and Means Committee very carefully went over the definition of "agriculture" and decided that this was the proper definition. If, as the chairman of the committee says, this would take child labor in agricultural first processing from under the provisions of the act, then I would like to see an amendment placed in the act that would prevent that. I do not believe that should be done.

Certainly, as the gentleman from California has said—and this is not by any means confined to the State of California—the act as it now stands exempts the very large farmer with a packing plant on his own farm, and is a detriment to his neighbors who are smaller and make use of cooperative packing plants. From that standpoint, certainly the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] should be agreed to.

As far as the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] is concerned, he understands, of course, that substantially all of these packing plants come under the seasonal exemption. At the present time, as far as seasonal work is concerned, his own plants come under that, and it has nothing to do with the definition of "agriculture." There is no joker in this amendment at all.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. Does the gentleman mean to say that if the definition of "agriculture" is contained in this amendment, it will have no effect at all upon the canning business of this Nation?

Mr. HINSHAW. The canning business is considered to be a seasonal industry, is it not?

Mr. KEEFE. The canning business has a 14-week exemption at the present time; that is true?

Mr. HINSHAW. Yes; that is true; under section 7 (b) (3), I believe, and section 7 (c).

Mr. KEEFE. If the Norton amendment is passed, they will be permitted to work for 60 hours a week, will they not?

Mr. HINSHAW. Well, that is getting a little beyond my present subject. Perhaps the gentleman has thought that all out, but I do not see that the definition of "agriculture" has anything to do with the canning business. It is specifically exempted in the definition.

Mr. KEEFE. The definition of "agriculture" is what controls the Administrator when he makes his rulings, and that is what I am interested in.

Mr. HINSHAW. No. I have section 526.3 of the rulings before me, and that states that a seasonal operation is one which ceases production, apart from such work as maintenance, repair, clerical work, and so forth. That is what the gentleman must be referring to.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If I understand subsection 4 of the Buck amendment in setting forth this definition, it says—the provisions of this paragraph shall not be deemed to be applicable with respect to service performed in connection with commercial canning or commercial freezing or in connection with any agricultural or horticultural commodity after its delivery to a terminal market for distribution for consumption.

Mr. HINSHAW. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As I understand, that is a clear-cut exemption of all our commercial canning factories and it in no way involves them. Then when you come to the seasonal provision in this law as it now stands, and as it is in this amendment, they will still be exempt?

Mr. HINSHAW. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I agree with the gentleman from California that it seems to me the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] was incorrect in the observations he made a few moments ago, and I am in favor of this amendment.

Mr. HINSHAW. I thank the gentleman very much. I am in favor of it myself and I hope it is adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, under authority granted to extend my remarks I should like to add for the RECORD that I am strongly in favor of establishing minimum wages. I cannot agree, however, with all the provisions of the act relating to maximum hours as there are so many different situations requiring different treatment that to lay down fast rules is bound to work serious injustices. Many workers in my district object to the maximum-hours provisions and rulings as they effect an actual reduction of total wages that may be earned; and employers object because of the virtual necessity imposed of hiring part-time workers who are not familiar with the work. Rules that are fair in one situation are unfair in another. I will not be surprised if within another 2 years the workers themselves come in and demany broad amendments to the maximum-hours provisions for the purpose of removing the strait jacket in which they now find themselves.

Following are three of the many letters I have received bearing directly upon this subject. It will be noted that the objections voiced are in opposition to the maximum hours limitations, not minimum wages, and that they refer to seasonal operations:

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1940.

To the Members of the House:

We regard it as urgently necessary that Congress should pass the Barden bill, H. R. 7173, to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, commonly known as the Wage-Hour Act.

Under the act, those who are engaged in agricultural pursuits, together with those employed in handling or processing agricultural commodities in the area of production are exempted. However, this exemption has been largely nullified by the wholly illogical and unwarranted interpretation or ruling made by the former Administrator of the act, Mr. Andrews. While his successor has been in office for about 6 months, this ruling still stands.

The purpose of the Barden bill is to amend and clarify the original act so as to give agriculture and the processors of farm commodities in the area of production the exemptions to which they are justly entitled.

Under the Agricultural Adjustment Act it is the declared purpose of Congress to give agriculture price parity with the other groups in our national life. But during the past 2 years the exchange value of farm commodities as compared with commodities that farmers must buy has stood at only about 75 percent of the pre-war level, 1909–14. No industry could be expected to function very long under such a tremendous handicap and remain solvent.

The Wage-Hour Act, as it has been misinterpreted, simply operates to make the old disparity greater than ever. As we see it, Congress has a responsibility in this matter that it cannot afford to evade. We trust that the Barden bill may be enacted.

Yours sincerely,

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
By FRED BRENCKMAN,
Washington Representative.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCERS LABOR COMMITTEE,
Los Angeles, Calif., April 25, 1940.

HON. CARL HINSHAW,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HINSHAW: The Agricultural Producers Labor Committee directly represents the great majority of fruit and vegetable growers on the Pacific coast. These farmers are solidly behind the Barden bill.

Under the present definition of area of production more than 70 percent of the establishments where these fruits and vegetables are washed, graded, and packed are subject to both the wage and hour provisions of the Act, and the farms are required to pay the increased costs imposed by the Act, while the other 30 percent are not subject to the act. There is no economic justification for excluding part of the farms from the act and imposing the costs on other farmers, when all of their operations are clearly within the well-established area of production, and were intended by Congress all to be exempted.

The burden to Pacific coast fruit and vegetable farms arises primarily from the hours provisions of the act; the 14-workweek exemption is entirely inadequate, and the farm is required to pay time and a half for a large part of its labor. California pays the highest agricultural wage in the United States and the pyramiding of time and one-half on the high wage means double penalty to these growers.

It does not benefit those Pacific-coast farmers to force up agricultural wages in competing areas, because experience shows such increases are not reflected in better prices or better markets.

Very truly yours,

IVAN G. MCDANIEL.

THE WHOLESALE JEWELRY TRADES ASSOCIATION,
OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA,
Los Angeles, Calif., March 27, 1940

HON. CARL HINSHAW,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Overtime requirements of the wage and hour law are a great burden and handicap to wholesale jewelers.

The reason for our existence is that we service the retail jeweler, and to do this satisfactorily it is necessary that we have a full force of employees always on hand to serve them. During the busy retail seasons we must be open longer than the time prescribed in the wage and hour law. We cannot pass this additional expense along to the retailer or consumer; therefore it becomes a burdensome loss to us.

We earnestly urge your careful consideration of our problem and request your support of bill (H. R. 8045) introduced by Congressman CASEY.

Yours verly truly,

THE WHOLESALE JEWELRY TRADES ASSOCIATION,
OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA,
ARTHUR P. CARE, President.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. FADDIS. I rise in favor of the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, once more I want to congratulate the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] in endeavoring to write into this piece of legislation definite and exact instructions to a bureau to act in accordance with the desires of the Congress. In a free country any delegated power which is not clearly defined and bound by rules is dangerous. Too many times in the past the Congress has granted unlimited powers to an agency, commission, or bureau, only to find that that agency, commission, or bureau has undertaken to exercise more power in enforcing or administering the law than the Congress itself has the power to exercise.

In regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] it plainly states that it applies to the processing and handling of fruits and vegetables and other agricultural products in their natural state. It does not and cannot be interpreted as applying to canning or any process of that kind.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. Not only can it not be implied but it specifically states in the amendment that it does not apply to commercial canning or commercial freezing.

Now, may I state to the Committee, in case there has been some misinterpretation, as the gentleman from Wisconsin misinterpreted the amendment, that this does not affect the necessity of the Committee's voting on the Barden amendment or the Norton amendment, either or both, to section 13. It does not interfere with it; it has nothing to do with them at all. My amendment, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania pointed out, is a logical definition of agriculture. It is thus exempted under section 13 and has nothing to do with these new conditions.

Mr. FADDIS. The gentleman has, of course, stated the case correctly. I regard it as very important in this or any other piece of legislation that Congress should definitely state its objectives and definitely state its intentions in writing legislation. It is essential to the success of representative government that the boards, bureaus, or commissions should be held strictly to the letter of the law. Not very many days ago we had the Walter-Logan bill in front of us. It was the frequent and deliberate misinterpretation of acts of Congress on the part of bureaus, commissions, and boards which brought about the necessity for the Walter-Logan bill. So I regard this as an excellent opportunity for the Congress to write into a piece of legislation the intentions and the aims they intend for the legislation to accomplish. It is highly essential that the term "agriculture" be clearly defined.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I am sorry I cannot yield now.

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in the amendment offered by the gentleman from California that is not just toward agricultural workers. It has been stated here by some who wish to crucify everyone who has a business of his own or even his own farm, that this can be applied to cooperatives. Of course, it can be applied to cooperatives not only in the State of California but to cooperatives all over the United States, if you please. It does not apply to any one section or any one place; it applies generally throughout the entire Nation and therefore cannot be discriminatory. It is intended to give a man in business a chance. Unless we do so, we are going to have more instead of less unemployment.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I wish it to be definitely understood that this amendment applies only to the processing of fruits and vegetables in their natural state. It does not and cannot be applied to canning factories, to canneries, to industries connected with the processing of cotton into cloth, or wool into cloth, or hides into leather. It applies only to those natural processes which the farmer or the horticulturalist must go through in order to prepare his goods to go from the garden, the farm, or the orchard to the market. It does not and cannot apply to the marketing of those goods. I am not for the Barden amendment, but I am for the Buck amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this is a meritorious amendment and I hope it will be adopted. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, my opposition to this amendment is based on the language in paragraph (4) reading:

> Or in the case of fruits and vegetables as an incident to the preparation of such fruits and vegetables for market.

I am not a lawyer, but I am just thinking of this in a rough way. If the words "on the farm" were added it might be less objectionable, but if this language were deleted, it would, I believe, then constitute a fairly adequate definition. The language, "as an incident to the preparation of such fruits and vegetables for market" if confined to preliminary preparations might be all right, but it might be interpreted to mean the ultimate preparation, in which case I cannot see why it would not operate to exempt people working in canneries and other processing institutions.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to all amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act. It has not, in my judgment, had time to get into operation.

Finally, let me say that I am opposed to all amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act. If allowed to stand for another 6 months or a year, with such latitude as the Administrator has at his disposal, I am convinced that Colonel Fleming would then be in a position to report to Congress and suggest such amendments as, in his judgment, based on actual experience, were desirable.

With the swarm of amendments that will come from the floor, with the utterly ruinous, and intentionally so, Barden amendments, this act will go to the Senate a jumble of contradictions that will reflect no credit on the House as a deliberative body.

So I am going to oppose all amendments until such time as the act has had an opportunity to be thoroughly tried out.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I rise in support of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time in an effort to help my colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] clarify the amendment which he has offered. At the risk of being also in bad taste I want to refer to my own personal experience in the field of agriculture in California to clarify further the statement my colleague made with reference to his own packing shed, his own ranch and the fix that his neighbors, small farmers, find themselves in.

It so happens that my brother and I are engaged in the raising of pears in California. We have a ranch that is large enough to justify the maintenance of our own packing shed. There we pack our pears and make them ready for shipment to market to be sold in the East and elsewhere. In the neighborhood of our ranch are numerous small farmers having perhaps 10 or 20 acres of the same exact commodity we grow. In many cases these farmers, because they cannot afford to maintain their own packing sheds, are forced to haul their fruit to neighboring towns and have it packed there by cooperative packing sheds. Under the present—may I say "goofey"—definition of "area of production" those small farmers come under the terms of the Wage and Hour Act and are certainly penalized because of the fact that they must shoulder additional costs in preparing their fruit for market.

Please do not misunderstand me. None of us in California have any desire to have the wage provisions in the Fair Labor Standards Act eliminated. We already pay wages to agricultural labor that in most cases is far in excess of the present minimum requirement. Naturally we would like to see the wages in competing sections of the country raised to our level. I think that is exactly the point that my colleague from California [Mr. BUCK] was trying to make. He, as a farmer who maintains his own packing shed as we do, is in exactly the same fix in which we find ourselves. We are freed at the present time from the operations of the Wage and Hour Act, but Congress is, in effect, penalizing the small farmer whom this administration continually claims it is trying to assist. This is manifestly unfair.

Mr. Chairman, the district which I represent maintains in several cities that are outside of the area of production, under the present definition, a great many vegetable- and fruit-packing sheds. I have tried to find how the present definition of "area of production" affects them, and I have received two wires in reply that I wish to direct your attention to.

WATSONVILLE, CALIF. 24.

HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Nine vegetable-packing sheds in Watsonville vicinity, of whom 7 are subject to Wage and Hour Act unless exempted under 14-workweeks provision, and of those 7 only 1 is exempt under area-of-production definition. Fifty apple packers, of whom about half are subject to act unless within 14-workweeks provision, and of that 25 about 12 are exempt under area-of-production definition. Average packers hourly wages is 80 to 90 cents and other workers therein anywhere from 50 to 60 cents.

There is one example of how the present area-of-production definition works.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. The gentleman understands that whether this definition is adopted or not, if the amendments offered which remove the term "area of production" and setting up the exact exemptions as provided in my bill are adopted, the situation will be taken care of.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. As I understand it, and as it has been explained by the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from California, if this amendment that he has offered is adopted, it in no way affects the specific exemptions set forth in either the Barden, Ramspeck, or Norton bills. If I am not right in that statement I hope you will correct me.

Mr. Chairman, I have another wire here which I should like to read.

SANTA CLARA, CALIF. 24.

JACK Z. ANDERSON,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Average wage 45 cents per hour. Approximately one-third to one-half exempt wage-hour law. One shipper, 500 cars, 95 percent exempt, other no exemption. Manifestly unfair. When shippers' seasonal crops already paying one and one-half to two times United States minimum, law should not require overtime on above high values.

SANTA CLARA PEAR ASSOCIATION.

Mr. Chairman, the small farmer in many cases has no exemptions while the large shipper has them. We are penalizing the small farmer rather than helping him as Congress was supposed to be doing by the enactment of the present bill. It seems to me it is about time that the Congress take steps to define agriculture and agricultural labor on a fair and equitable basis. Am I any less a farmer because I happen to grow carrots in the city limits than if I grow carrots 30 or 40 miles outside the city limits? We must define agricultural labor on the basis of the work performed and not on the basis of where it is performed. We must cease saddling the farmer with increased costs brought on by misguided administrative interpretations of the laws that Congress has enacted. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly was surprised to hear our colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS F. FORD] state a few minutes ago that he would oppose all amendments to this bill. I want to take this opportunity to speak on an amendment which I shall offer in order to protect the industrial and agricultural workers of the United States from unfair competition of long-hour and low-wage foreign workers. If you are on the ocean in a lifeboat which springs a leak through a small hole, you are not going to get to shore if you try to plug that small hole with one hand and take your other hand and make two or three new holes in the boat so that the water can come in.

My amendment will be offered when we reach page 17 of the Barden bill. I notice on page 16 that the committee recognizes the necessity of protecting workers in these wage-hour-protected industries from the unfair competition of American and foreign convict labor. We know that in many parts of our country when we figure the subsistence and other costs of caring for convicts, in addition to the amount of payments which are made to them when they engage in productive work, the convict receives in our American penitentiaries far in excess of the wage which many workers receive in the oriental and many other foreign countries. I sincerely hope that all of those who want to protect the working people of America will support my amendment when it is offered. I propose to offer the following amendment, which I will now read so that you will be familiar with its protecting features when it is offered when we reach page 17 of the Barden bill:

On page 17, line 4, after the period at the end of line 4, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 21. In order to protect the minimum-wage and maximum-hour standards prescribed in sections 6 and 7, it shall be unlawful for any person to import or cause to be imported from any foreign country, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, or aid or assist in importing any goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined wholly or in part in foreign countries unless such imports are produced, manufactured, or mined under the same minimum-wage and maximum-hour provisions which would be applicable if they were manufactured, produced, or mined in the United States."

Mr. Chairman, I cannot imagine how anyone who speaks on behalf of the working people of the United States when speaking in favor of the Federal Wage and Hour Act will advocate that we should put American industries under the minimum-wage and maximum-hour act and then continue to permit competing imports from foreign countries where the workers work almost twice as many hours for a wage which is much lower than the minimum fixed for competing American industries. If we continue to raise the cost of American production and the importation of cheap foreign imports we will destroy the jobs of many of our American workers who are now employed and make it difficult for the 11,000,000 who are now unemployed to obtain a job. We cannot import the products of cheap foreign labor and then raise the production cost of competing American products. If we do that, we will furnish thousands and thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands, of jobs to workers in foreign lands to the great injury of our American working people.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Has the gentleman conferred with the members of the Labor Committee to see if they are agreeable to his amendment which would protect American labor?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I am speaking on the floor of the House now with reference to the amendment which I shall offer on the floor and ask all of the real friends of American labor to vote for it. Remember, our Lord said: "No man can serve two masters." Your vote on my amendment will determine whether you choose to serve the workers in foreign lands or the workers in the United States, including the 11,000,000 who are unemployed and who want a job and cannot find a job. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments to section 2?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I have had several requests over the telephone from Members who are not present for information with reference to how long we shall run tonight. I have been trying to get an agreement on time to determine whether or not we shall be able to finish the amendments to the Barden amendment today. Evidently that is not possible. I want the House to understand that I am not trying to rush this bill. As far as I am concerned, you can take all week to finish it. I am perfectly satisfied to stay here for the rest of the week. I simply want to try to get some idea about how long it will take to perfect the Barden amendment. If the Members who want to speak or offer an amendment would rise so that we could determine how long it would take, I believe we would be able to come to some definite understanding.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. May I express to the chairman the wish that we go along for at least 30 or 40 minutes or an hour, and then we can tell something about it.

Mrs. NORTON. I believe the Members are rather anxious that the Committee rise at 5 o'clock. However, we would like to find out appproximately how long it might be before a vote on the Barden amendment may be reached.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. COX. I wish to make an observation touching the question raised by the chairman. I think, Mr. Chairman, in determining the question of how long we should run this afternoon, we should be informed as to whether or not there is a purpose to suspend consideration of this bill by crowding something else in tomorrow morning, as is rumored on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole cannot make any statement with reference to what may transpire tomorrow.

Mrs. NORTON. May I say to the gentleman from Georgia that that is not the intention of the chairman of the Labor Committee.

Mr. COX. I did not mean to intimate that the chairman had entered into any sort of an understanding; but, Mr. Chairman, it is commonly reported on the floor of the House that there is a scheme on to crowd in something else tomorrow morning, putting off further consideration of this bill until the matter that is raised has been disposed of.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, there have been so many rumors around the floor that it would be utterly impossible to keep track of half of them. However, I wish to repeat that that is not the intention of the Committee on Labor.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have just heard a remark about there being some probably sinister motive involved in shifting aside this bill until some other legislation is brought to the floor. The program states specifically that we will have the agriculture appropriation bill conference report up tomorrow, regardless of what may happen to this bill today, and, as far as I understand, that is what is going to happen. We are going to have the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill up tomorrow.

Mr. COX. In view of that statement, I trust this Committee will stay in session until it finishes the consideration of the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments to section 2 of the Barden amendment?

If not, are there any amendments to section 3?

Mr. HOFFMAN and Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I believe the Chair will find that I previously sent an amendment to the desk.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his preferential motion.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that when we adjourn tonight we adjourn at 5 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that is not a preferential motion in the Committee of the Whole.

The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina: On page 4, line 20, strike out "not."

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is to strike out the word "not'" in line 20 of page 4. As this provision is now written, there is a double negative in the sentence, and this amendment just strikes out the word "not."

Mr. SABATH. Is that the only "not" in the bill?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I could answer my friend very nicely, but I do not believe I will right now.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there is so much confusion and misunderstanding over these pending amendments that, in my opinion, no Member of this House really understands the full import of what is going on this afternoon. This only emphasizes the foolishness of trying to legislate in this manner. The rule which brought about all this confusion and uproar should have been voted down in the first place. However, there is no use crying over spilled milk, but because this House erred in the first instance is no reason why we should err again. So that we save ourselves from being the laughingstock of the Nation we should vote down all amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act and wait for at least another year before taking any action. Give it a chance to operate. I will confess that I cannot follow these amendments and I know that the rest of the Members feel the same way.

I notice the amendments make reference to "home work." I should like to have someone on the floor of this House, and especially the chairman of the Committee on Labor, explain to me just what is meant by "home work." What does it mean and how far-reaching is the provision which provides for "home work"?

Many Members have been bewailing the fact that our workmen are not being given the wage they deserve. The trouble is that the standard of living of the American workman is being jeopardized by these amendments and especially because of the "home work" provision contained herein.

In Europe and other foreign countries the standard of living and wages are held down because this "home work" stuff is the order of the day. The factories farm out piece work to the homes, where the women and children are forced to work in order to earn enough for the family, thereby getting around the child-labor laws. If you adopt these amendments you are setting up sweatshops and opening the door for child labor. These canning factories and antilabor sweatshops will take advantage of the "home work" provisions to break down all labor legislation on the books. They will use them to break strikes and force unions back to the days of 1932. You Republicans would not even want those days back. We passed the wage-hour law in the interest of the low-paid worker. Is 30 cents an hour too much? It may be too much for the backers of the proponents of these amendments to pay, but no man with a spark of humanity in his body would ask any man to work for less.

I am fearful of the fact that if you keep this home-work provision in this bill you are going to drag down the American workman to the standard of living in Europe. Oh, I have listened to the pleading of the gentlemen who favor the amendments speak loud and long for the poor workingman, but at the same time feel that $12.30 a week is too much for them to earn. Suffering humanity cries out for help, but that cry is ignored by the sympathizers of these vicious antilabor amendments. I notice that the so-called Norton amendments, which is a misnomer because she does not claim credit for them, provide for the home work. Vote them all down and play safe.

They tell me the textile industry wants these amendments. They manufacture the cloth for vest pockets. I am just wondering whether the vest pockets of some suits do not contain orders to some of those who favor these amendments, and they are used as a transmission belt for some of the statements made in this House.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOOK. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. As the gentleman knows, the Barden bill is under discussion, and if he wants an explanation of anything in the Barden bill, I would suggest he not direct his remarks to the chairman of the Labor Committee but to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN].

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I will gladly yield for any question the gentleman may have.

Mr. HOOK. What does the phrase "home work" provide for?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. May I say to my friend from Michigan that this refers to, and is generally understood to mean, the general rule of rural home work and it refers only to rural home work. Now, just listen to this amendment——

Mr. HOOK. I refuse to yield further. I have read that amendment. Let me tell you this. When you provide by legislation the vehicle for manufacturing institutions to be able to turn over their production to home work, you have brought about a situation whereby this home-work proposition can be used as a real strikebreaking proposition, and that is a serious proposition and not a laughing matter so far as your home work is concerned.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOOK. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. The gentleman is informed, perhaps, of the condition that has been brought about by the sweatshop system in New York through using the home-work plan.

Mr. HOOK. This home-work provision is nothing but the means of again setting up and bringing back the old sweatshop. You know, as all should know, full well that the Barden amendments seek to deprive the rural homemakers of the protection now given to women and children by the minimum wage in the act.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOOK. I yield.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. I suggest the gentleman yield to the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma who is perhaps the best expert on the subject of homework.

Mr. HOOK. As I have said, someone mentioned vest pockets and their purpose. I have heard also of cesspools of political iniquity where the political machines are financed from the blood and sweat of the American workmen. They are forced to work for less than enough to keep body and soul together, and the original Fair Labor Standards Act was put on the statute books to try to drain these cesspools of political iniquity so that men and women could not be kept in peonage. So that some day they could exercise their God-given rights and send men to Congress who will protect their constitutional rights in order that the ordinary, common workingman of the United States could at least earn enough to keep from starving.

Vote down all amendments and we will drain these cesspools of political iniquity and bring to the people of America a better day. The issue is clear-cut. If you want child labor, if you want women working in factories for starvation wages, if you want men to be pushed down below the standards of the beast of burden, then vote for these amendments. If you believe that labor is entitled to a fair return for a day's work, then vote down these amendments. Do not be misled by the agrument that agriculture needs these amendments. The farmer does not need them. They are proposed by the processor of agricultural commodities. They will exempt the real sweatshops. They will exempt the very institutions that the original bill intended to cover. Don't go back to your respective districts and tell them you voted for amendments that took away the only protection the low-paid worker has. These should be known as the empty-dinner-pail amendments. In the interest of the democratic spirit of our forefathers, keep the Fair Labor Standards Act intact, without any change.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOFFMAN: On page 3, line 13, after section 3, insert "(a)", and on page 5, after line 17, insert the following:

"(e) No employer shall be deemed to have violated subsection (a) by employing any employee during any period of 26 consecutive weeks for a workweek in excess of that specified in such subsection without paying compensation for overtime prescribed therein (1) if such employee is so employed on a salary basis, (2) if such employee has been in the employ of such employer for not less than 6 months, and (3) if the average workweek averaged over such 26-week period does not exceed that applicable under subsection (a)."

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is not complicated and I am sure, if you will read it, you will discover it has but one purpose. It was prepared by counsel for the legislative committee at my request and the object, and the only object, is this: To enable those employers who can give employment during a rush season to those workers who have worked short weeks during the dull season to give that employment without falling under the provision which requires pay at the rate of time and a half for all time over the specified number of hours per week. Note this: It does not have anything to do with the hourly rate. It applies only to those employees who are on a straight-salary basis. It does not apply to any employee who may work for a week or a month or 2 or 3 weeks or 2 or 3 months. It applies only to those that we might designate as old employees who work not less than 26 consecutive weeks.

Perhaps the purpose of the proposed amendment can be best illustrated by a concrete example. Here is a factory making steam traps, in a town of approximately 8,000 population, employing around 80 men. The peak of its business covers a 6-month period running from October to April. The "white collar" workers formerly worked as little as 35 hours per week, and as long as 48 hours at the peak, the average at no time exceeding the former legal hours of 44 or 42 per week.

When the wage-hour law reduced the number of hours from 48 to 44, its employees who were on a salary basis did not receive a cut in wages. When the hours were reduced to 42, they still received the same weekly pay. They received for 42 hours' work the same pay they formerly received for 48. Next October there will be another decrease in the legal hours, to 40 hours per week. The result is that these salaried employees will have received a total increase of 20 percent in their wages, although they work eight hours less per week.

During the past 20 years no "white collar" worker has ever lost by deductions from pay any time due to illness, operations, holidays, vacations, or for any cause whatsoever. As a matter of fact, the employer retained on the pay roll for a period of more than a year one employee who was sick and unable to work. One of the employees, a widow, 37 years of age, with a child 13 years of age, had an operation which took her away from her work 6 weeks, during which time she received full pay. She also was off a day and a half for other reasons, so that, including holidays, she was off 40½ days, for which she received full pay.

Nevertheless, under the law as it stands today, after October 24, 1939, the first time that she worked more than 42 hours, the employer was forced to pay her time and a half.

Many cases might be cited where the employees, during one week, want a day or two days off for some particular purpose. Business is slack. They are perfectly willing to make up the time the following week. The employer is willing. But, without this amendment, if time is taken off one week it cannot be made up the next week unless the employer pays time and a half for all time over the 42 hours.

This amendment, if adopted, will promote amicable relations between the employee and the employer, for it will enable them to arrange the work to suit the convenience of both without any reduction in the pay of the employee.

For example, the employees may be off for a time and work for only 20 or 24 hours a week. Then, because of a busy period, they can work 44 or perhaps 48 hours a week, and they want to do it. It in no way affects their wage, for they are paid by the week or month, and their check is for the same amount, no matter how many hours per week they work.

If some amendment of this kind is not adopted, what will happen is this: These smaller factories are now on a weekly or a monthly wage basis. The employer must meet competition; and if he is forced to pay time and a half for all overtime and the employees work many hours less than 42 hours per week during certain weeks and the rate of production falls, he cannot meet the competition and he will be forced to put all employees on an hourly wage, and so when the dull season comes along the employee will receive pay for but 20 or 25 or whatever number of hours he actually works, while if this amendment is adopted he will receive the full amount of his weekly or monthly check, for he will have been afforded an opportunity to make up the lost time.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. In the first portion of his address the gentleman mentioned the legislative committee.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, the counsel for the legislative committee prepared the amendment, because I desired to have it drafted in terms similar to those used in the drafting of the bill.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman tell us how many might be exempted under this amendment?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No one is exempt. This enables a man who has only 25 hours this month to work the next month a longer time, so that the total of his period of employment is the same as though he worked the average number of hours each week or month. He is on a weekly or a monthly salary. It does not apply to the man who works by the hour. It does not exempt anyone from the provisions of the wage-hour law. It does not increase the total number of hours that anyone might work during a 6-month period, under the law as it now stands; nor does it lessen the amount of wage which he would receive.

It merely enables an employee who wants to get off 1 week to make up his time the next week. It enables an employer, who cannot provide the maximum number of hours every week, to pay the same wage for 20 hours' work 1 week that he would have paid had 42 hours been worked, and to require the employee to make up the difference during subsequent weeks.

Mr. DINGELL. As things are now these people are paid overtime and, if this amendment passes, a substantial number would be exempted, would they not? I am trying to get the straight of this thing.

Mr. HOFFMAN. They are paid overtime at this time, but here is what would happen: Unless you adopt something like this to enable those who are on a weekly or a monthly pay basis to work this way, the employer will put them on an hourly basis, and they will not get any overtime at all. Their total number of hours would be less; their wages would be less. It is to those who are working on a salary, who have time off, who have a vacation, and who are never charged for lost time that this amendment will apply.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], it seems to me that will take care of the seasonal employment, and is well worth while. I hope it will be adopted by the Committee.

The purpose of the Hoffman amendment is to permit industries whose operations are largely seasonal to have employees make up in rush periods time lost during slack seasons. A large industry which is typical of several in my district manufactures fine stationery, in which the labor cost is by far the largest item. In fact, in 1938 the labor in each box of stationery amounted to 18 cents, whereas the gross profit was only 4½ cents. If time and a half is required to be paid during the rush periods, it would mean an actual loss of 4½ cents, which means that many orders necessarily would go unfilled in this line of goods.

It is a well-known fact that most manufactured products are put on the market by the manufacturer some months in advance of the time of seasonal retail sales. Concerns like this one, which have a large holiday business, do not hear from their jobbers in time to avoid the necessary extra hours to fill these orders. It is to pick up the slack that comes about during the nonactive period of the year and have it apply under the Hoffman amendment that industries such as the one to which I am referring need the benefits of this legislation. It is apparent that it is favorable both to employee and employer, and I therefore hope it will be adopted by the Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina) there were—ayes 74, nays 38.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FULMER: Page 4, line 10, strike out the words "making pulp."

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that the purpose of subsection 4 is to exempt employees from the Wage and Hour Act where they cut the trees for any purpose; that is, for sawmilling or for the purpose of making pulp. I know in some instances they ought to be exempt in cutting and logging, but when it comes to cutting and hauling pulpwood, let me give you a picture of the situation in the South. We have been investigating forestry problems recently, and we sent an investigator through the Southern States to investigate what is going on in the cutting, delivery, and selling of pulpwood. When you exempt the cutting and hauling of pulpwood you are simply helping some middlemen and 40 or 50 large pulp and paper mills in the South, and not the wage earners. When these pulp and paper mills moved into the South we hoped that we would have an income for the wage earner and the farmer by receiving a fair wage and a fair price for pulpwood.

What has happened? The pulp mills have a hog-tied monopoly in buying pulpwood as far as the wage earner and the farmer is concerned. These pulp mills refuse to buy direct from farmers. They set up regions composing perhaps two or three counties, then they enter into a contract with a regional agent or contractor. This regional contractor then proceeds to employ one or more subcontractors, and these subcontractors proceed to buy from farmers, usually so many acres of pulpwood timber, employing cheap labor to cut and haul this wood to the railroad stations and load on freight cars. Thousands of farmers do not cut their own timber because of the low prices offered. Then, as stated, these agents or subcontractors representing the mill agent proceed to pick up Negroes and white people and hire them for any price and cut everything on the farmer's land. Under this arrangement the farmer is paid anywhere from 15 cents to $1 for not a regular cord of wood 128 cubic feet but what they call a unit measuring 160 cubic feet. May I state that the wages paid wage earners and the prices paid farmers for their pulpwood is simply highway robbery. No wonder we have thousands of people unemployed in the agricultural South and no wonder farm tenancy is increasing.

Now, the farmer is exempt and his employees living on the farm are exempt, but when you exempt those who cut pulpwood and those who deliver pulpwood to the railroad stations under the wage and hour law you are simply helping middlemen and the pulp and paper mills. I tell you they ought to pay a satisfactory price whereby thousands of wage earners in my country would be able to get enough to buy the real necessities of life. How do you expect business to succeed without this fair and necessary income to labor and farmers?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. I yield.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I think the gentleman is 1,000 percent right. That amendment, as it is worded, was advocated by our good friend from Maine, the late Mr. Smith. It is in both bills, but the making of pulp was never intended to be in there, and should not be in there. I hope the gentleman's amendment is adopted.

Mr. FULMER. I want to thank my friend the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman is talking not about making pulp, but cutting trees.

Mr. FULMER. The provision leads up to cutting trees for sawmilling or the making of pulp. If you eliminate that, it will eliminate the cutting of pulpwood.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment may be amended by striking out the other three words following "making pulp." In other words, "or other processing."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. TARVER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, let us hear the amendment as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. FULMER: On page 4, line 10, strike out "making pulp or other processing."

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, may I take 1 minute to explain the amendment to my amendment? The reason I am asking that you strike out the words "or other processing," although you strike out "the making of pulp," the fact that it states "or other processing" may include pulpwood. If you are exempting cutting and logging for sawmilling purposes, then there is no other processing that would be necessary.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. This is just for 14 weeks.

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. TARVER. If you are going to exempt the cutting of logs for pulp, why not exempt the cutting of logs for a chair factory?

Mr. FULMER. There ought to be some exemptions. However, there is quite a lot of logging and cutting done by these large operators that ought not be exempted.

Mr. TARVER. I am not saying that they ought to be exempted, but I think you ought to strike out the entire provision if you are going to strike out "other processing."

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. This was mainly in there for an exemption for 14 weeks, for the hours provision, on account of the snow and ice, and so forth, in the sections where they cannot cope with the situation. That is why it was put in there. I think the gentleman's amendment should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VORYS of Ohio: Page 4, line 23, after the words "packing plant", insert the following: "or the disposal of dead animals by reduction plants regulated by State laws."

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, we have in this bill an exemption from the hours provisions for slaughterhouses. We have a similar exemption in existing law. It is perfectly obvious that both voluntary production of live animals and involuntary production of dead animals on the farm are not governed by law but are regulated by natural processes, and that they may be produced at times when there will be a great many on hand or not any at all.

In Ohio we have a reduction-plant law which regulates the disposal of dead animals very strictly, in the interest of the public health. They must be taken off the farms and must be disposed of promptly.

This whole matter was taken up before the Wage and Hour Administrator by some people in my district who have a rendering plant and who turn dead horses, cows, and so forth, into fertilizer and other useful things; and the Administrator failed to see that, since it was regulated by public law, it should be exempt or that it was clearly within the meaning of the agricultural exemption. It seems to me that both the production of livestock and their death are of such character that not only slaughterhouses but rendering plants should be exempt; the Good Book says, "The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away and the time of His coming no man knoweth," not even Colonel Fleming; so that the work of disposing of live and dead stock, so important to public health, should be exempted from the hours provision—not from the wage provision—of the law.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman feels, then, that this should be removed from the jurisdiction of the Administrator?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. The going after dead animals and the times when the animals decide to die should no longer be left to his regulation.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is not a slaughtered animal a dead animal?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. That is what I thought, but the Administrator claims he is unable to make this exemption under the clear provisions of the agricultural and the animal exemptions. It is just another example of the need for amendment caused by capricious rulings of bureaucrats.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Does not the gentleman think that the language of his amendment would exempt all slaughtered animals instead of just animals that died a natural death?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. No. I think the reference to reduction plants regulated by State laws shows what is meant.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. Is not that mostly an intrastate activity?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. One would certainly think so, but the Administrator has ruled that these plants are interstate in character because possibly some of their fertilizer or other products trickle across State borders. This is not an academic question but is an important and live question in my State, and I have no doubt in many other places.

Mr. KELLER. Has not the Supreme Court of the United States accepted that view of it?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. No; there is no way to get to the Supreme Court of the United States; and the Administrator has ruled that these plants and the collection of dead animals are subject to the wage and hour laws.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Under the argument advanced for the gentleman's amendment should not the exemption be applied to undertakers and grave diggers?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I doubt very much if they come within the realm of agriculture or of interstate commerce. [Applause.]

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I should not rise at all in this discussion except for the fact that I happen to come from an agricultural district and I have been fed full of this argument here to the effect that this bill is in the interest of agriculture. Even the last amendment about regulating the hauling off of dead horses and cows from streams and fields was mentioned as a benefit to agriculture. That is a different kind of benefit you are giving agriculture, though not, of course, new. Since I have been in this Congress—6 years—there has rarely been a bill considered by it but what some Member has made the claim that the bill was intended as a direct benefit to agriculture. As I see this thing, if there is any benefit to agriculture, it is entirely hidden. Now, you take a lot of my people that have been referred to as "Okies," people who have had to quit Oklahoma and Kansas on account of economic conditions on the farm, people who got together a few dollars and bought a second- or third-hand Ford car and went to California. Now, you are going to cut them off out there. You want to get these fellows out there in California without a dollar and then say to them when they go to work for somebody that is running a business such as the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] is running: "You must not pay him enough to live on in California, but let him go back to Oklahoma or somewhere else if he can." I love the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK]. I think he is a wonderful Member of this Congress, and it must be accredited to him that he is magnanimous and desires by his amendment to bring his neighbors up to the same level of protection he gets from the Board. The way to correct the wrong done to Mr. BUCK's neighbor farmers is to undo the favoritism shown by the Board to the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] and not do an injustice to a number of poor individuals who are entitled to the minimum of 30 cents an hour when they can find work to do for him.

If a mistake has been made, the mistake was made in exempting the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] and his farm from the operation of this law. When a poor man gets stranded out there in California, whether he is from Oklahoma or anywhere else, is he not entitled to 30 cents an hour for his labor? He is out there with a wife and children in many cases, nowhere to go, with no friends; yet you want to cut him off at the pockets when you get him out there in California and deny him the right to work for the wages that anyone else gets out there. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, it is not right, it is not a fair proposition.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASSINGALE. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KITCHENS. There seems to be an idea around that instead of letting him get $12.60 a week, or around there, they should let him starve to death.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I do not know just what the gentleman means, but you are fixing under this program to give the farmer 60 cents a day perhaps if he hauls off dead horses or if he does any kind of work on a farm in California. That is what this bill means. We ought not to do it.

If the bill is worth anything, it ought to have some value to everybody who labors in farm packing plants, whether in California or elsewhere. It is generally known that in California there is much labor on farms, in packing fresh fruits for shipment. What good reason is there why such packer should not pay what the law says? If it is not operating fairly, let us not put in a lot of foolish amendments here that we do not understand, indiscriminate, senseless amendments that nobody understands. If nobody understands the operation of the law, why not take time to consider it? Let the board that grants the exemptions quit putting unreasonable constructions of the law into their rulings. By adoption of the amendments, we are hurting the very poorest, and by letting the law alone no one will be hurt much. I think we should delay any attempt to amend until we do have time to study and understand it. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, like my friend, the gentleman from Oklahoma, I happen to come from an agricultural district, but I can beat the gentleman from Oklahoma, because, having lived on the farm all my life, I know what the farmer is up against.

Since being a Member of Congress I have supported labor legislation and farm legislation. If I had to make a choice, I perhaps would support farm legislation in preference to labor legislation, but the Barden amendment would injure workers and farmers alike. However, I am getting tired of those who oppose labor legislation, holding up the farmers as an example in order to injure the laboring men. This legislation, as written, is hard for me as a layman and farmer to understand. I feel a little better about the situation, however, when I hear the attorneys here stand up and argue back and forth and ask one another what the bill provides. I do not believe there are many of you who know what the amendments do provide. [Applause.] I have come to the conclusion that as long as we have 300 attorneys in this Congress we will be up against this situation. [Applause.] The reason for this is that you attorneys made your living before you came to Congress because the people did not know what the law was and they got into trouble, and you put in your time trying to get them out. [Applause.]

There is something we should all understand. This bill will cut the wages of thousands of workers, the men and women who are earning 30 cents an hour.

I was here the other day and heard the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] make a plea for the farmers and a long statement as to the condition the farmers were in. I agree with him. I know the condition of the farmers as well as the gentleman from North Carolina. He cited an incident that he was up against when he, as a farmer, shipped some lettuce. He made the statement that he shipped 25 baskets of lettuce to market and they sent him back 16 cents. I think I can go the Congressman one better. I, myself, shipped two carloads of potatoes, 750 bushels in each car, and I threw in $65 worth of new sacks. I received a report on the one car and they requested that I send $2.54 to finish paying the freight and other expenses. I did not get any report on the other car and did not request any, as I was afraid they would ask me for more money. I never did hear from them about it. So the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] and I do not disagree on the condition of the farmer, but I do disagree with him on the solution.

I came here expecting to remedy the condition of the farmer. I have helped some since I have been here, but we have not as yet finished the job. I do not agree with the gentleman from North Carolina that you can help the farmers by cutting the poor man's living below 30 cents an hour. I do not believe you can help the farmer by making a man or woman, with a family to support, work for almost nothing. In fact, by cutting their wages, you would reduce their consuming power and thereby further reduce the prices that the farmers now are getting for their produce.

One trouble is that the farmer does not have a market for his produce because labor has not the money to buy with. By reducing wages you destroy the buying power of the workers, who consume and buy his goods.

As long as the special-privilege groups can keep the farmers and the workers fighting each other, just that long will they be able to rob them both.

If these packing plants can get labor down to 10 or 15 cents an hour, I do not see how this will help the farmer. My idea is to raise the standard of living by putting a bottom under labor, which we are attempting to do, and not try to put labor down with the farmer. You also have to put a bottom under agricultural products.

Instead of trying to pull down the wages of poorly paid workers, it is more essential and much more helpful if we try to raise farm prices. We should be passing legislation guaranteeing the farmer parity prices instead of cutting wages and destroying the little market he has now. As a farmer, I expect to support labor on the legislation being considered today and I hope tomorrow when we are trying to get parity prices for farm produce and when we consider other helpful amendments to the farm program that you Members from the laboring districts support the farmer. This will be greater help to the agricultural sections than by trying to reduce the wages of poor people, which would only benefit the big packers and canners. If there are any savings they never would be passed on to the farmer anyway.

This argument is an old trick of the chiselers and the special-privilege groups and they sometimes fool a lot of people with it. They are always trying to split the workers and the farmers, while robbing both groups for many years. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and Mr. BOLAND having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill, H. R. 5435, to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEGISLATIVE ESTABLISHMENT APPROPRIATION BILL—1941

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, H. R. 8913, making appropriations for the legislative establishment for the fiscal year 1941 with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference with the Senate, and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Chair appoints the following conferees: Messrs. RABAUT, FERNANDEZ, MCANDREWS, POWERS, and RICH.

THE WAGE AND HOUR LAW

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD a brief statement made by me on April 25 on House Resolution 289, which I inadvertently left out of the RECORD at that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH]?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, it is unnecessary for me to state that I am unalterably opposed to this hydra-headed gag rule through which the Barden bill strikes at the very heart of the humanitarian wage and hour law.

Mr. Speaker, the issue is clean-cut: Whether 1,500,000 workers should be deprived of the protection of a law which requires the payment of 30 cents an hour, $12 a week, or be forced back under the provisions of the Barden bill to the starvation wage of 5 and 10 cents an hour. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields 3½ minutes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], may have permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD on the subject of the agricultural appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made this afternoon and to include some charts and illustrations which came from the Senate Civil Liberties Committee report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a short editorial.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made in the Committee of the Whole today and include therein certain letters I have received.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address delivered over the radio on April 23 by William L. Hutcheson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a few editorials.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in the remarks I made in Committee of the Whole this afternoon certain excerpts from a letter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include a table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article by David Lawrence appearing in today's Washington Evening Star.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

NAVY DEPARTMENT AND THE NAVAL SERVICE APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 8438) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the Naval Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nevada? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and, without objection, appoints the following conferees: Messrs. SCRUGHAM, FERNANDEZ, CASEY, CALDWELL, DITTER, PLUMLEY, and MCLEOD.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein two telegrams I have received and one letter on the pending legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter of my own and an answer thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a short editorial.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I have just been informed, in answer to an inquiry, that responsible officials of the Railway Express Agency have stated, concerning the proposed reorganization of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, that I may say the officers of this agency who have the responsibility of developing air express feel the Civil Aeronautics Authority, both in its policy and administrative functions, is progressing along right lines as contemplated in the act and believe real progress has been made.

In view of this, they feel the status of the Authority should remain unchanged, at least for the present, in order that the constructive work which has been done may be continued without interruption as would necessarily result from any change.

Mr. Speaker, I have also talked today with Mr. Gill Robb Wilson, who is the very able president of the National Aeronautic Association, and when I asked him the position of that association on the proposed reorganization plan, which would shift the independent C. A. A. into the Commerce Department, he called my attention to the action taken by the executive committee of his group at Tulsa, Okla., on April 25 against the reorganization. I ask unanimous consent that this statement may be included as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

The National Aeronautic Association, through its executive committee, in session at Tulsa, Okla., April 25, expressed the following opinion regarding C. A. A. reorganization order No. 4:

"The formation of the Civil Aeronautics Authority came as a result of deep study by the Congress of the United States in an effort to correct past weaknesses in the governmental aid to aeronautical development and to foster and develop civil aeronautics.

"It is the belief of the National Aeronautic Association that the Congress evolved legislation which provided adequate ways and means of correcting past deficiencies and providing for efficient future development of aviation in this country.

"The National Aeronautic Association further believes that the Civil Aeronautics Authority has gone far during its short existence to justify the faith placed in it by the people of the United States through its representatives in Congress.

"Therefore the National Aeronautic Association, in reiteration of its historic position in support of an independent agency to handle all civil aeronautical matters, regards the proposed reorganization order No. 4 as detrimental to the continued safe and efficient development of aviation in the United States."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding and hope that on tomorrow we shall vote on the conference report on the most important, the most needed, the most vital, and yet the most misunderstood appropriation bill that annually comes before this House—the agricultural appropriation bill. This bill comes back from the Senate with three very vital matters in disagreement. First, the appropriation of funds for the continuation of the tenant home-purchase program under the Jones-Bankhead bill; second, the necessary funds for the food-stamp program of the Surplus Commodities Corporation; and finally, the most important question of good faith as well as good judgment in providing funds to make the promised parity payments.

Some 3 months ago this bill was passed by this House with scant consideration for the needs of one-third of the people of these United States. We seemed to ignore the fact that 3 years before we had embarked on a program of governmental aid to home ownership in both city and country. Under that program we have appropriated $800,000,000 for slum clearance in the great cities. We have a bill now pending to provide another $800,000,000—a needed work, but a staggering price. At the same session of Congress at which we authorized the ambitious city-slum-clearance program of the United States Housing Authority we authorized a small and modest start on the problem of rural slum clearance—of farm-home ownership by some of those who are now tenant farmers. Some of the finest work of the Farm Security Administration has been done along these lines, and yet this Government has up to date appropriated only $75,000,000 for loans to deal with the rural slums. This cannot be due simply to a desire to economize because during this same time we have given nearly 10 times that amount to the city-housing authorities, and the money that goes to the cities will not be repaid while all we have ever done for the tenant farmer and all we ask for him now is that this Government continue to loan him money which he has and will repay. We have been generous, my friends, with our gifts of public money to the city-slum dweller. Let us not now turn the back of our hand when the even more needy rural-slum dweller asks for a simple and modest loan.

The authorization bill that you and I passed 3 years ago held out the hope to our tenant farmers that their Government would loan them $50,000,000 next year, for the purchase of homes under a program that has proven its soundness. The President's budget recommended that we appropriate at least one-half this amount. The Senate has provided the full amount. This House has provided nothing. Let us, on the morrow, join with the other body and keep faith with the most helpless economic group in this broad land.

Another item in disagreement between the House and Senate is that of funds to carry on the work of the Surplus Commodities Corporation—particularly the "food stamp" program. This is a program of such widely recognized merit that I trust it will receive general support. The Senate has provided $86,000,000 for this work. The House should accept the Senate amendment. The work of the Surplus Commodities Corporation directly aids the relief client in the large city no less than the farmer. In fact, its major benefits are probably effected in the interest of low-income consumers by enabling them to buy a substantially larger amount of needed food. This item might be more properly charged to relief than to agriculture, but here it is in an agricultural appropriation bill, and it should be passed for the good of the entire Nation. It will do little to help the producers of the great surplus staples like wheat and cotton, but it is a step in the right direction. It will materially aid the producers of specialty crops—fruits and vegetables. It is of tremendous assistance to the needy all over the country. It strikes at the problem of surpluses in a fundamentally sound manner. It does not attempt to create prosperity by the distruction of things people need. On the other hand, it encourages production. It puts men and acres to work. It adds to the sum total of things people need, then it gets these things to the people who need them. This is beneficial both to the producer and to the consumer, and it seems to me that this program, small though it is as yet, has been worked out with a sincere desire to conform to sound fundamental economic laws. It is a program of plenty—of wider distribution. It recognizes that there can never be an overproduction of the good and useful things of life if we can but make our system of distribution keep pace with the development of our system of production. We have failed to do this in the past and have been forced to resort to temporary stop-gaps which we have all recognized are not the final answer to our problem, but which have been and still are necessary until we can greatly improve our system of distribution. The "food stamp" plan is helpful. It is certainly a step in the right direction, but it cannot be applied to all sections of the country, much less to all crops, overnight. Nor should we jeopardize its success by too rapid expansion. If it is to build as soundly as I trust it may, it must build rather slowly. The funds provided by the Senate are sufficient to provide for this sound and orderly expansion of this program and they should be voted.

However, the provision for the extension of the food-stamp program cannot under any stretch of the imagination be taken as a justification for the omission from this bill of the funds necessary to make the so-called parity or price adjustment payments long ago promised to our farmers. It is to be devoutly hoped that in the course of time we will so improve our system of distribution that those who need the bountiful production of all our farms will be able to buy it. The food-stamp program should help, but it is as yet but a small factor. It has very little effect, if any, on our great export crops like wheat and particularly cotton. In the absence of a two-price system—that is, a reverse tariff—the price of these export crops will always be the lowest price for which competitive products can be purchased anywhere in the world, cost of transportation taken into consideration. We do not have a two-price system for agricultural products as we do for industrial products. We have not as yet devised an adequate system of distribution in the United States. Millions of our citizens cannot buy the gingham dresses, the denim shirts, and the cotton sheets that they need. If they could, it would go a long way to solve the cotton problem. We recognize that fundamentally we need increased use of cotton and increased buying power. This administration is doing everything possible to increase the buying power of our people. We are also striving mightily to increase the commercial uses for all our crops, particularly cotton, which constitutes our major surplus problem. The new regional agricultural laboratories will soon be in operation. I have introduced a bill to provide a substantial prize payable to anyone who can devise new uses for cotton. I have been assured of an early hearing on this bill by the Committee on Agriculture. But, with all this, we are faced with a tremendous surplus of cotton at this time and with little or no prospect of any immediate disposition of that cotton. Wheat, corn, tobacco, and rice farmers find themselves in little better position than cotton farmers, but it happens that I am better acquainted with the cotton problem, and inasmuch as cotton has always been by far the most important single item in our American foreign trade, and inasmuch as the production of cotton employs more people than any other single crop in this country, I shall proceed to make special reference to cotton.

In February 1938 we passed, and the President signed, the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, which established what is generally known as the A. A. A. I voted for this act. I realized then just as I do now that it is not a solution of the farm problem, although its provisions, particularly in regard to soil conservation, strike at fundamentals. The farm problem, however, goes much deeper than the A. A. A.; it certainly goes as far as the tariff which for generations has forced my people to sell in an open market and to buy from the industrial sections in a protected market. Actually, the problem goes even deeper than that, but this week we are to deal not with these fundamentals but only with an appropriation bill. This bill cannot reach the fundamental discrimination that has been operative against American agriculture, but it can, and it should, make effective the palliative and temporary relief promised by the Agricultural Adjustment Act. That act proclaimed as one of its major objectives a program to assist farmers to obtain both parity prices and parity income. It undertook to achieve this parity relationship, at least, in part, by the payment of price adjustment or, as our farmers call them, "subsidy" checks.

Nor was the payment of these price-adjustment payments undertaken without consideration. The act establishes a far-reaching program in which all farmers are invited to participate. This program involves in the cotton country, or at least in the Southwest, very substantial reductions in acreage. These reductions are required both for the long-time purpose of protecting the soil and for the immediate purpose of reducing the total production of cotton. Inasmuch as the rest of the world has increased its cotton acreage just about as fast as the United States had decreased its cotton acreage there has been little noticeable increase in world price as a result of our attempt to control production. Although, of course, it cannot be said that had there been no reduction of American cotton acreage there might not have been an even further decline in cotton prices. The market price of American cotton is still determined by the world price and there is no protected American market for even that portion of our crop that we consume domestically as there is for the domestically consumed portion of our industrial production. I have, along with other Members, sought to secure this protection for our cotton farmers, but so far without success.

We must, therefore, face the facts. On the invitation of this Congress our farmers have materially reduced their cotton acreage. The same is true of other staple crops. With this reduction of acreage came as an intended and desired result a reduction in production. In the absence of a return of profitable world prices for our export crops this has, of course, resulted in a very substantial reduction in farm income—the very thing that Congress and the President sought to prevent. This turn of events was not unanticipated, however. In fact, in contemplation of exactly this situation the Agricultural Adjustment Act made provision for price-adjustment payments to the cooperating farmers as a partial compensation for the losses they sustained through their acreage reductions. In other words, we set up a cooperative plan. The farmer agreeing to refrain from planting to capacity—thereby making his individual contribution to the public good—in an effort to control crop surpluses until such date as we are able to establish a more effective system of distribution, and the Government undertaking to partially reimburse the farmer by paying him a sum which when added to his soil-conservation payments and to the price he receives for what he grows, will give him—not parity income, not even parity price—but roughly three-fourths of parity price on that portion of his production which remains available to him after he has made his contribution to the common welfare. This has actually meant in most cases that the small farmer of central Texas has received about one-half of the parity income of which we so glibly speak. I say this not in the attitude of complaint but of gratitude for what we have received. This administration is the first that has ever given us any consideration whatever. The aid thus extended to our people has not made us prosperous. The average tenant farmer in the South earns for his year's work only one-fifth as much as the average industrial worker of the Nation, but the program has enabled millions of American citizens to carry on. They have made their contribution to the program. All we ask now is that the Government of the United States keep faith with these people and that this House vote tomorrow to include the Senate amendment to provide for the continuation of parity or price-adjustment payments.

That you may realize just how substantial the sacrifices of our farmers have been, I desire at this point to insert some figures I secured today from the Department of Agriculture showing the cut in acreage, production, and income that the people of my six counties have taken in their effort to make the general farm program a success. I shall also insert figures to show the relative contribution of the Federal Government.

County and year	Cotton acreage	Cotton production	Value, cotton and seed	Government contribution, all payments	Farmers' contributions, reduced net income

Total for the 6 counties, reduction	615,430	236,280	32,631,744	4,355,000	28,276,744

[1] 1938. (Figures not available for 1939 but payments were 10 to 12 percent less. 1940 payments will be approximately the same.)

Reductions throughout are comparisons of 1939 as compared with 1928 figure except as above noted.

These figures show a net income from cotton and cottonseed in 1928 of $42,688,000. In 1939 this income had dropped to less than one-fourth of its former amount, $10,056,256. Add to this the $4,355,000 Government contribution, and you still find the farmers of these six counties suffering a net loss of $28,276,744, or approximately two-thirds of their total income.

I do not mean to suggest that this tremendous loss in income has been the result of the farm program. On the contrary, our people feel that had we had no farm program the loss might have been even greater. I do, however, want to suggest that no other group of our American citizenship has suffered any comparable loss in income or buying power. I am advised that the average industrial wage is today 14 percent higher now than it was in 1928. The earnings of many of our industries are back to or are fast approaching the 1928 level. Yet, regardless of the reason, we find a great group of American citizens with their buying power reduced to a small fraction of its former proportions. I do not present these figures to excite your sympathy but rather in the hope that they will arouse your instinct of self-preservation. Can the representatives from the great manufacturing centers that once poured a steady flow of products into the farming regions look at these figures and still wonder what has happened to your markets? Bring back this lost purchasing power in the farming regions and you will wipe out the unemployment of the cities. I do not contend that the payment of the relatively small sum that is provided in the Senate amendment for "parity" would of itself restore all of this loss in income, but definitely it would help. And it would help not only the farmer but every industry in America. For 20 years the Departments of Commerce and Agriculture have kept accurate figures which show that for every dollar added to farm income we have added $7 to the national income. I know of no better investment our Government can make than to aid in the maintenance of farm income and farm markets for American industry. I hope that the representatives from all sections will join together to see that the United States carries out its part of the trade we made with our farmers. [Applause.]

Mr. POAGE asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and to include therein certain tables prepared by the Department of Agriculture.

SENATE

TUESDAY, APRIL 30, 1940

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 24, 1940)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, who alone dost rule and govern the hearts of men: We thank Thee for the manifold blessings of Thy bestowal, for the uplift of gladdening thoughts, for the spirit of understanding by which we share the joy and sorrow of others, but most of all we bless Thee for the strength and calm which Thine unseen Presence brings. Be with us in the deliberations of this day; make reverent our thought, that we may cling to that which is good as again we pledge our fealty to the sovereignty of duty. Purge away the vanity, cruelty, and intolerance that is in the world, and grant that the spirit of the blessed Christ may break down all barriers and answer the desire of all nations, and may we never be content with aught that excludes another from the welcome of Thy loving heart. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day of Monday, April 29, 1940, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. MINTON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] are unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE] are detained on public business.

Mr. MCNARY. I announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] are absent attending to their duties as members of the Board of Visitors to the United States Naval Academy.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is in Boston, Mass., today attending the primary election in that State.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

FARM-TENANCY PROGRAM

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 30, 1940.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: My attention has been called to an apparent disagreement between the House and Senate conferees with respect to the farm-tenancy program under title I of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, for which I included in the annual Budget for 1941 an estimate in the sum of $25,000,000.

I am anxious that provision for this program be made in the Department of Agriculture Appropriation Act for 1941, which is now in the final stages of congressional action. I wish, therefore, to advise that if, in view of the many pressing budgetary needs for 1941, the Congress feels this item might better be financed through a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation than by means of the direct appropriation proposed in the Budget, I would have no objection to adoption of the loan plan, provided the language of the bill making provisions for the loan by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has the approval of Administrator Jones.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

AMENDMENT OF THE JUDICIAL CODE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7737) to amend the Judicial Code by adding a new section thereto, designated as section 266a, to provide for intervention by States in certain cases involving the validity of the exercise of any power by the United States, or any agency thereof, or any officer or employee thereof, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. MILLER, and Mr. DANAHER conferees on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from the executive committee of the American Association of Port Authorities, by J. Alex Crothers, president of the association, Chicago, Ill., praying for the enactment of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 519) to suspend section 510 (g) of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, during the present European war, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the annual conference of the Missouri Valley Synod, Evangelical and Reformed Church, at Washington, Mo., favoring the enactment of the bill (S. 3579) to extend the Federal old-age and survivors' insurance benefits of the Social Security Act to certain employees of religious and charitable organizations, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Washington (D. C.) Chapter of the Federation of Architects, Engineers, Chemists, and Technicians, favoring the enactment of Senate bill 591, the so-called Housing Act of 1940, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3524) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claims of the Choctaw Indians of the State of Mississippi, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1552) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2952) authorizing the Court of Claims to adjudicate and render judgment on certain claims of the Cherokee Indians, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1556) thereon.

Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2705) creating the Great Falls Bridge Commission and authorizing the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the Potomac River near the Great Falls of the Potomac, reported it without recommendation and submitted a report (No. 1553) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 246) to suspend section 510 (g) of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1554) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 3775. A bill to accept the grant to the United States of certain land by the State of South Carolina and to authorize its use by the United States Coast Guard (Rept. No. 1559);

H. R. 8423. A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the Coast Guard," approved January 12, 1938 (Rept. No. 1560); and

H. R. 8537. A bill to provide for the enlargement of the Coast Guard depot at Seattle, Wash., and for the establishment of a Coast Guard servicing base at or near Chattanooga, Tenn. (Rept. No. 1561).

Mr. ELLENDER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 217) for the relief of Charles B. Payne, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1557) thereon.

Mr. MURRAY, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred the bill (S. 3230) to promote the national health and welfare through appropriation of funds for the construction of hospitals, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1558) thereon.

REPORTS ON DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

Mr. BARKLEY, from the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Executive Papers, to which were referred, for examination and recommendation, 15 lists of records transmitted to the Senate by the Archivist of the United States, which appeared to have no permanent value or historical interest, submitted reports thereon pursuant to law.

AMENDMENT OF SOIL CONSERVATION AND DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT ACT, ETC.

Mr. SMITH, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, reported a bill (S. 3886) to amend the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title, and he submitted a report (No. 1555) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McNARY:

S. 3877. A bill for the relief of William Joseph Caisse; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DOWNEY:

S. 3891. A bill to enable Mike Agalsoff, and others, to enter and remain permanently in the United States; to the Committee on Immigration.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE—AMENDMENT TO WALTER-LOGAN BILL

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I do not yet know what attitude I will take on the Walter-Logan bill, but I am reliably informed that as it passed the House of Representatives it included within its provisions one giving a right of appeal to the courts respecting the decisions of practically all the loaning agencies of the Federal Government, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Electric Home and Farm Authority, the Disaster Loan Corporation, and several other governmental corporations. It was quite obvious from the provision that it was not intended that these agencies should be included. Therefore, I am offering an amendment and a short statement, and I ask unanimous consent that the amendment and the statement I have prepared concerning it be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the amendment and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] to the Walter-Logan bill (H. R. 6324): On line 24, page 14, strike out the comma after the word "agencies" and insert the following: "and lending independent agencies, the Federal Loan Agency, and all agencies and independent agencies grouped thereunder."

MEMORANDUM ON WALTER-LOGAN BILL

If the Walter-Logan bill (H. R. 6324, S. 915) passes the Senate in the form in which it passed the House the Federal Housing Administration and most of the other agencies grouped in the Federal Loan Agency, as set up by one of the President's reorganization plans, will be practically put out of control of their affairs. The agencies included in this group are as follows:

Reconstruction Finance Corporation.
Electric Home and Farm Authority.
R. F. C. Mortgage Co.
Disaster Loan Corporation.
Federal National Mortgage Association.
Federal Home Loan Bank Board.
Home Owners' Loan Corporation.
Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation.
Federal Housing Administration.
Export-Import Bank of Washington.

The only language in the act as it passed the House which undertakes to exempt these agencies from its provisions are the words "all Federal lending agencies" contained in section 7 (b), which is the section setting out the departments and agencies intended to be exempted from the operation of the law.

This language "all Federal lending agencies" does not include any of the agencies above mentioned.

It does not include the Federal Housing Administration and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, because neither of them is a lending agency, while it does not include the other agencies above mentioned because they are all "independent agencies" and not "agencies" under the specific definitions of the act.

Subsection 3 of section 1 defines the word "agency" to mean any department, independent establishment, administration, corporation, or other subdivision of the executive branch of the United States Government with one chief officer as the immediate head thereof, and subsection 4 defines the words "independent agency" as meaning any board, commission, authority, corporation, or other subdivision of the executive branch of the United States Government with two or more officers at the head thereof as a board or commission.

Under these definitions all the agencies mentioned above, except the Federal Housing Administration, are "independent agencies" and not "agencies," and therefore they would not come within the exemption of "all Federal lending agencies" contained in section 7 (b).

As pointed out above, the Federal Housing Administration is not included and cannot by any stretch of the imagination be held to be a lending agency, inasmuch as it has not and never has had the authority to lend any money.

It was understood that all these agencies were to be exempted from the provisions of the act by an amendment to be offered in the House. Such an amendment was prepared and was actually offered, but was withdrawn. This was done apparently under the impression that the term "all Federal lending agencies" included this group. Congressman WALTER, who was in charge of the bill in the House, so stated at page 4722 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of proceedings in the House on Thursday, April 18, 1940. Mr. WALTER said:

"Mr. Chairman, it was the intention of the committee to except from the operation of the bill all of the Federal lending activities. That includes the activities grouped under the President's Reorganization Plans I and II, under the Federal Loaning Agency, together with the Farm Credit Administration, the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, the Commodity Credit Corporation, and the Rural Electrification Administration. The committee felt that there ought not to be any right to appeal to the courts in the event there is refusal to grant a loan. Certainly the Federal Housing Administration and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, and these other independent agencies that are not lending agencies, ought to be excepted, together with all of the Federal lending activities."

If this bill is not amended so as to exempt these agencies, Congress had just about as well repeal the acts setting them up.

Under section 4 of the act any mortgagor, who might be aggrieved by the action of the Federal Housing Administration in rejecting an application for the insurance of a loan on his house, could, within 20 days, appeal to an interagency board, to be set up by the Administrator, and if the board did not decide the case to suit him, he could take an appeal either to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia or the circuit court of appeals of the jurisdiction in which he lived.

Every act of the Administrator, even acts undertaking to set up construction standards and location standards for houses constructed under the F. H. A. plan, and the promulgation of regulations setting forth the conditions under which mortgages would be insured, would be subject to appeal, first to this interagency board and then to the courts of appeal.

It would be utterly impossible to operate the National Housing Act with any efficiency, expediency, and success under this law as it now stands.

The amendment which is attached hereto would completely straighten out the situation.

ESTATE OF REXFORD M. SMITH—AMENDMENT

Mr. BROWN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 5089) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims of the United States to hear, examine, adjudicate, and render judgment on the claim of the legal representative of the estate of Rexford M. Smith, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ARMY PROMOTION SYSTEM—AMENDMENT

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9243) to provide for the promotion of promotion-list officers of the Army after specified years of service in grade, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

DEFENSE COORDINATION OF THE PANAMA AND FLORIDA CANALS

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I submit for reference to the Committee on Printing with a view to its being printed as a document, with illustrations, a statement on the defense coordination of the Panama and Florida Canals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the statement will be received and referred to the Committee on Printing.

SENATOR WHEELER AND THE PRESIDENCY

[Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article by Robert Bendiner entitled "Men Who Would Be President—BURTON K. WHEELER," published in the Nation of April 27, 1940, which appears in the Appendix.]

CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY AND AIR SAFETY BOARD

[Mr. PITTMAN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD two articles from the Washington Times-Herald of April 30, 1940; a telegram from Paul W. Hairgrove, president of the Licensed Airmen of America; a telegram from the Associated Aviation Underwriters; and a letter from the San Francisco Junior Chamber of Commerce; all relating to the proposed transfer of the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Air Safety Board to the Department of Commerce, which appear in the Appendix.]

RESOLUTION OF LEAGUE OF AMERICAN PEN WOMEN ON COPYRIGHT CONVENTION

[Mr. THOMAS of Utah asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the National League of American Pen Women favoring the ratification of the copyright convention, which appears in the Appendix.]

"PEACE AS A POLICY"—ARTICLE BY BARNET NOVER

[Mr. TRUMAN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article published in the Washington Post on Monday, April 29, 1940, written by Barnet Nover, entitled "Peace as a Policy," which appears in the Appendix.]

SYMPOSIUM OF EDITORIAL COMMENT ON WEST VIRGINIA CAMPAIGN

[Mr. HOLT asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a symposium of editorial comment on the West Virginia campaign, which appears in the Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8438) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. SCRUGHAM, Mr. FERNANDEZ, Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts, Mr. CALDWELL, Mr. DITTER, Mr. PLUMLEY, and Mr. MCLEOD were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8913) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. RABAUT, Mr. FERNANDEZ, Mr. MCANDREWS, Mr. POWERS, and Mr. RICH were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker pro tempore had affixed his signature to the following enrolled joint resolutions, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. J. Res. 199. Joint resolution amending Public, No. 112 of the Seventy-fifth Congress and Public Resolution No. 48 of the Seventy-sixth Congress; and

H. J. Res. 437. Joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States of America to proclaim I Am an American Day for the recognition, observance, and commemoration of American citizenship.

THE TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2925) to amend the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the committee, which will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 10, after the word "States", to insert "and the counties therein", so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 13 of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933 be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 13. In order to render financial assistance to those States and local governments in which the power operations of the Corporation are carried on and in which the Corporation has acquired properties previously subject to State and local taxation, the board is authorized and directed to pay to said States, and the counties therein, for each fiscal year, beginning July 1, 1940, the following percentages of the gross proceeds derived from the sale of power by the Corporation for the preceding fiscal year as hereinafter provided"—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 5, after the words "payments to", to strike out "be in lieu of taxes and to", and in line 6, after the word "Corporation", to strike out "for the fiscal year then beginning and to be made upon condition that no State, county, or local taxes shall be assessed or levied against the property, operations, or business of the Corporation", so as to read:

Together with such additional amounts as may be payable pursuant to the provisions hereinafter set forth, said payments to constitute a charge against the power operations of the Corporation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 19, after the words "United States", to insert "The payments herein authorized are in lieu of taxation, and the Corporation, its property, franchises, and income, are hereby expressly exempted from taxation in any manner or form by any State, county, municipality, or any subdivision or district thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 15, after the word "State", to insert "(including payments to counties therein)"; in line 16, after the words "less than", to insert "an amount equal to"; in line 19, after the word "State", to strike out "plus" and insert "and against"; in line 21, after the word "Government", to insert "and held or operated by the Corporation"; in line 25, after the word "operated", to insert "or said land was privately owned"; on page 4, line 3, after the word "property", to insert "(including payments to counties therein)"; in line 4, after the word "case", to insert "Provided further, That the Corporation shall pay directly to the respective counties the 2-year average of county ad valorem property taxes (including taxes levied by taxing districts within the respective counties) upon power property and reservoir lands allocable to power, determined as above provided, and all payments to any such county within a State shall be deducted from the payment otherwise due to such State under the provisions of this section"; and, in line 14, after the word "States", to insert "and counties", so as to read:

The payment for each fiscal year shall be apportioned among said States in the following manner: One-half of said payment shall be apportioned by paying to each State the percentage thereof which the gross proceeds of the power sales by the Corporation within said State during the preceding fiscal year bears to the total gross proceeds from all power sales by the Corporation during the preceding fiscal year; the remaining one-half of said payment shall be apportioned by paying to each State the percentage thereof which the book value of the power property held by the Corporation within said State at the end of the preceding fiscal year bears to the total book value of all such property held by the Corporation on the same date. The book value of power property shall include that portion of the investment allocated or estimated to be allocable to power: Provided, That the minimum annual payment to each State (including payments to counties therein) shall not be less than an amount equal to the 2-year average of the State and local ad valorem property taxes levied against power property purchased and operated by the Corporation in said State and against that portion of reservoir lands related to dams constructed by or on behalf of the United States Government and held or operated by the Corporation and allocated or estimated to be allocable to power. The said 2-year average shall be calculated for the last 2 tax years during which said property was privately owned and operated or said land was privately owned: Provided further, That the minimum annual payment to each State in which the Corporation owns and operates power property (including payments to counties therein) shall not be less than $10,000 in any case: Provided further, That the Corporation shall pay directly to the respective counties the 2-year average of county ad valorem property taxes (including taxes levied by taxing districts within the respective counties) upon power property and reservoir lands allocable to power, determined as above provided, and all payments to any such county within a State shall be deducted from the payment otherwise due to such State under the provisions of this section. The determination of the board of the amounts due hereunder to the respective States and counties shall be final.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 16, after the word "State", to insert "or county in equal monthly installments beginning", and in line 17, after "31", to strike out "of each year, and it is the intention of the Congress that each State shall redistribute said payments or a portion thereof to counties and other local taxing districts affected by the program of the Corporation", and insert "1940", so as to read:

The payments above provided shall in each case be made to the State or county in equal monthly installments beginning not later than July 31, 1940.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I should like to address a couple of questions to the senior Senator from Nebraska. I am not certain that I fully understand the pending bill, and I desire to ask the Senator whether the money which is to be paid in lieu of taxes is to be paid out of the profits of the T. V. A.

Mr. NORRIS. It is.

Mr. BROWN. I am not particularly familiar with the financial record and returns of the T. V. A. operations. The T. V. A. makes substantial profits, does it, out of which these sums may be paid?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. There is not any danger that the amount due would become a charge upon the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. NORRIS. I think not.

Mr. BROWN. Why does the Senator cover merely State and county taxes, without including township and city taxes in his bill?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator will remember that the T. V. A. does not own any distributing systems. They are owned by the different municipalities.

Mr. BROWN. I did not know that.

Mr. NORRIS. And when the T. V. A. sells to a municipality, the contract provides that there shall be paid to the municipality the same taxes that would be paid if the distributing system were privately owned. So there are two sources from which this money in lieu of taxes is paid: First by the T. V. A. proper upon all generating systems, wherever located, and upon all transmission lines; but since the T. V. A. does not own the distributing systems in the various cooperative and farmer organizations and municipalities, Congress, of course, does not attempt to legislate on the subject; but the T. V. A., in making contracts of sale to municipalities and farm organizations, provides that upon such property thus owned by the localities there shall be paid in lieu of taxes a sum equal to what would be paid as taxes if the property were privately owned.

Mr. BROWN. That applies, then, in the two ways the Senator mentioned. The transmission lines are taxed by the municipalities?

Mr. NORRIS. The distributing lines, as distinguished from the transmission lines. The transmission lines are owned by the T. V. A., and upon those lines and upon the generating systems an amount equivalent to taxes is paid.

Mr. BROWN. In my State a transmission line which goes through a township, as distinguished from a county, is required to pay a local township tax. I am speaking of a transmission line, not a distributing line.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that condition applies here also.

Mr. BROWN. Does that type of tax apply? Would the T. V. A. pay any township tax for a transmission line running through a township?

Mr. NORRIS. Under the bill as amended, instead of paying to the States the T. V. A. would pay to the counties, and I take it that the counties would divide up the taxes in the usual way.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I will say that we have no townships in Tennessee.

Mr. BROWN. I want to make my point clear to the Senator from Nebraska. If the T. V. A. were located in Michigan, unless the Senator, on line 10, page 1, included the words "townships and municipalities", there would be no tax upon any transmission line, because we do not have in Michigan a county tax upon a transmission line. We have a local tax levied by the township and the city; and I am wondering if the appropriate word to apply to a local agency in the States of Tennessee and Kentucky and Alabama should not be included in line 10. Would the Senator from Tennessee be able to clear up that point?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as I have just stated, there are no townships in Tennessee.

Mr. BROWN. What is the condition in Alabama and Kentucky?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think they have any townships, either.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. HILL. In Alabama we have taxes levied by counties, municipalities, and the State. We do not have townships.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is exactly the situation in Tennessee.

Mr. BROWN. Then should not the word "municipalities" be included in line 10, page 1, to be certain that a transmission line going through a municipality, as distinguished from a distribution line, would be subject to local taxation?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would be subject to county taxation, and the county taxation would include school districts and other subdivisions; but the property within a municipality known as a distribution system, unless it happens that a transmission line runs through a municipality, is owned, to begin with, by the municipality.

Mr. BROWN. Yes; I understand that distinction; but I am talking about the transmission line that goes through a city, we will say the city of Florence, Ala. Would that transmission line be subject to taxation by the municipality under the language of the bill? Perhaps the Senator from Alabama can inform me about that.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the Senator must bear this distinction clearly in mind: As a matter of law, I presume, none of this property is subject to taxation by the local authorities. This bill is intended not to acknowledge the contention which has been made that all this property should be thrown open to local taxation. I take it that no Senator would want to subject the property of the United States to that kind of a burden and that kind of a danger; but the money paid to the county in lieu of taxes, as I understand, would be divided up, and if part of a transmission line ran through a municipality, it would get its proportionate share of the money just as would every other geographical division.

Mr. BROWN. I am in complete agreement with the Senator's purpose; but I know that in my State the language "and the counties therein" would not cover the situation the Senator is trying to reach. If he said "the various local taxing authorities," I think that language would cover it all right.

Mr. NORRIS. We are dealing here with property of the United States located in seven different States of the Union. The laws of those States do not agree, but in order to harmonize the matter and make it agreeable to all of them this bill was prepared after a conference with the experts of the T. V. A. and also the representatives of the governments of the various States affected.

They have all agreed upon this language. So far as I know, there is no objection from any of the States. If there were a law in some State which might not be met, I take it the experts representing the various States would have pointed that out to the committee. But they appeared before the committee and advocated the adoption of these amendments, to which no one has objected, so far as I know.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I should not desire to attempt to overturn the work which has been done in the way the Senator has stated; but I wanted to call attention to the fact that, in my opinion, the language in line 10 would not cover the local taxing authorities in such States as Michigan. I am certain of that fact.

I have no particular interest in the matter. I rose principally because I wanted to be certain that there would be no possibility that any part of this burden would fall upon the Government of the United States, because many of us have been somewhat disturbed—and I know my colleague has received many letters, as I have—about the large amount of forest land which has been taken over by the Federal Government, and the consequent loss of real-estate taxes to the States, the counties, and the other local taxing agencies. If this bill in any way proposed to impose a burden upon the United States, I should feel that those of us from States where large areas have been taken over for forestation purposes should request that the Federal Government likewise assume a part of the tax burden which has been thrown upon the local taxing agencies by reason of the Federal Government taking over these lands.

In my State, whose area comprises about 60,000 square miles, about one-eighth of all the property in the State has been taken over by the Federal Government in the form of four or five great forest reserves. I am glad that has been done, but it is giving rise to a real problem in the poorer counties of the State of Michigan, and I know the same situation prevails in many sections of the West which confront the problem of supplying the funds necessary to make up the taxes lost by turning privately owned lands over to the Federal Government.

Since the Senator has assured me that there is no possibility of any of this burden falling upon the Government of the United States, I do not think I have any objection to the bill, nor do I think this is the proper time to raise the question of some contribution by the Federal Government in such cases as I have mentioned.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, yesterday I presented for printing in the RECORD a letter which I addressed to the Tennessee Valley Authority, which appears on page 5184 of the RECORD. In that letter there is an item representing question 4, and on the same page of the RECORD is the reply of the Tennessee Valley Authority. As to item 4, I was advised, and it so appears in the RECORD, that my—

Request for a break-down on this same material by counties necessitates a new tabulation. These data will be in your hands before May 1.

I have not as yet received the answer, nor have I the data therein referred to, but the Authority has telephoned my office within the half hour saying that the material is on its way, and it is expected and hoped that I will have it this afternoon. I ask unanimous consent that the material which I will thus present be incorporated in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks, in order that the RECORD may be complete in the particular referred to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY,
Knoxville, Tenn., April 29, 1940.

Hon. JOHN A. DANAHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR DANAHER: In further response to your inquiry of April 12, and as advised in our letter of April 23, we are sending you herewith data relating to the cost of lands acquired by the Authority.

Item 4 of your April 12 questionnaire requested, as you will recall, "the amounts in dollars paid for the lands within each of the affected counties taken for use by the Tennessee Valley Authority." The two tables enclosed, Nos. VI and VII, provide an answer to this question and complete the series of tables I to V, inclusive, which were transmitted with our communication of April 23.

As you will observe, table VI is confined to land values only, and for your convenience the lands purchased by the Authority for reservoir purposes in connection with its own dam-construction projects have been tabulated separately.

Believing the data would be of value to you, we have prepared an allocation by counties of the value of the electric utility properties, inclusive of both land and facilities developed thereon, purchased by the Authority from private utility companies. This is the information offered in table VII. Because our records of these properties are governed by forms previously established by their former owners and which are susceptible of break-down by counties only through some device necessarily arbitrary, we have followed the method of distributing the Authority's share of the purchase price of such electric properties by counties in proportion to the amounts of assessed valuation allocated to each county for such properties. We believe that a distribution on this basis, as presented in table VII, gives a reasonably reliable result.

We invite your attention to the explanatory footnotes attached to both tables as an aid in their interpretation.

Yours very truly,

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY,

[1] Consists of land only acquired from private utilities at a cost of $3,317,364 (which is also included in table VII), together with land and land rights acquired for substations, transmission lines, etc., constructed by Tennessee Valley Authority. The amounts represent cost of fee land, easements, flood easements, and riparian rights according to the books of the Tennessee Valley Authority after inventory and analysis of property purchased from the Tennessee Electric Power Co. shall have been completed and entered. Lands acquired from private utility companies are entered on Tennessee Valley Authority books at same values (original purchase cost, ordinarily) as previously carried on books of such private utility companies.

[2] Phosphate lands and mineral rights.

[1] The records of the T. V. A. do not carry a distribution by counties of the purchase price or value of electric properties purchased from private utility companies. For purposes of this table, the total T. V. A. portion of the purchase price of each block of private utility property acquired was distributed by counties in proportion to the allocation of assessed valuations of such property. (The latter values were included in tables I to IV, inclusive, transmitted to Senator DANAHER on Apr. 23, 1940.)

The purchase price of private utility company properties shown in this table includes land as well as other types of electric property. The amount of such land values overlaps the figures shown in the last column of table VI, as follows, by States:

State:
Alabama	$185,559
Georgia	437,333
Mississippi	12,853
Tennessee	2,681,619
Total	3,317,364

The form of the records makes it impracticable to adjust for such overlapping figures on a county basis.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I have given this matter considerable thought and it has given me great concern, as I know it has the Senator from Nebraska, with whom I have had several of the most friendly conversations on the general subject matter involved.

Let me call to the attention of the Senate the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska at the hearing, appearing on page 33 of the report of the Senate committee hearing. Said the Senator from Nebraska:

Oh, yes; the States could provide by statute that when any municipality received anything in lieu of taxation it should be subdivided just the same as though it was taxes—which we cannot say.

That, I agree, is a correct statement of the law, that Congress cannot say how those taxes shall be apportioned, or how the income derivable from rates shall be apportioned in lieu of taxation among the municipal or county subdivisions of the States. The Senator continued:

Some people get an erroneous idea about us, I think, because we do not want to say—and certainly I never would favor an act that would say, as some amendments have been introduced to do—that in all this property the T. V. A. has taken it shall be subject to local taxation, just the same as it always was. The Federal Government could not, in my judgment, ever submit to that kind of thing. If it did, it would be taxed out of existence in 3 months. We would have to pay taxes every time we built a post office or courthouse or improved a place for boats to land along the river, or anything of that kind. In other words, the Federal Government cannot submit itself, cannot afford to submit itself, to the power of local boards to tax the Federal Government. And after all, the Federal Government, when we speak of T. V. A., the Federal Government owns all the properties that they possess. T. V. A. does not own anything.

Mr. President, I agree with that statement of the Senator from Nebraska. I agree with it word for word.

As a matter of interest, merely to emphasize the point made by the Senator from Nebraska, I wrote to the assessors of 8 or 10 Connecticut cities to ascertain the amount of taxes they lose in the individual cities as a result of the Government post offices located there. In the city of Hartford, for instance, the city annually loses $54,114.50 in taxes; the city of Waterbury loses $24,245; the city of Middletown loses $6,046.84; and so it goes, emphasizing clearly that there are large losses locally whenever the Government undertakes to devote local property to governmental use.

The problem raised by T. V. A., however, is not, of course, analogous to that of the post-office situation, and I do not contend that it is. I say, though, that the observations of the Senator from Nebraska were most pertinent when he pointed out the difficulties inherent in the situation which post offices, military reservations, and the like are involved. But, as I see it, if we undertake to extend this particular method of apportionment of taxation back to the counties, and, as the Senator from Michigan puts it, without reference to the municipalities involved, we are undertaking to enter a sphere which it seems to me we should not enter. I believe we go as far as we properly should if we allocate back to the States in question the amount of the tax that is involved.

Mr. President, that is emphasized, as I see it, by other testimony appearing in the report of the Senate committee hearings. Let me read a statement made by Mr. Lapsley, which appears on page 34 of the report of the hearings. Mr. Lapsley said:

Now, Mr. Chairman, I thought it would be interesting to the committee to know this, because the problem is so different in Alabama than it is in Tennessee, and that is that the money collected by the cities in Alabama is not only not paid to the counties and the State but the cities have organized to oppose the passage of any such legislation; and whereas in Tennessee certain cities, I understand, have put the money in trust in the bank and are waiting for the passage of enabling legislation, and are offering to pay the money to the counties and the State, the Alabama cities make no such proposal, and we look on it that as a practical proposition it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to pass any legislation to force the cities to turn any portion of the tax equivalent that they collect over to the States or the counties.

Mr. President, the difficulty confronting us is that we are not creating any standard or yardstick that is applicable generally. Quite the contrary, what we are undertaking to do is to allow agencies of the Government, through their agents in turn—the Tennessee Valley Authority in this particular instance—to enter into an agreement with representatives of the counties affected, and allow them to establish the basis by which there will be recoupment or reimbursement to the individual counties of the amount collected in lieu of taxes. In the absence of a yardstick which can be applied in Tennessee as well as in Alabama, or to some irrigation project in the West, or, if you please, to some military reservation somewhere else, when the Government takes land and uses it for military purposes, it seems to me that we have gone far beyond any of our power when we delegate to creatures of a Government agency the authority to enter into such an arrangement.

Mr. President, there are standards that have been defined in the law, such as the assessment of damages and benefits, for instance, for public improvements. It seems to me that there should be a common formula which could be applied everywhere on some such basis. How best to do it I do not know. The fact that there is this great difficulty in Alabama and other States affected indicates clearly that we confront a very definite problem which requires further and better study.

Let me say further, Mr. President, that the Senate committee hearings contain a statement by Judge Elmer L. Eblen. Apparently he is a county judge of Roane County, Tenn. His statement, illustrative of the difficulties inherent in the situation in Tennessee, appears at pages 42 and 43 of the Senate committee hearings.

He points out there a situation so dire that it naturally arouses our sympathies toward the problem involved, and we can easily see how many of the Tennessee counties have been adversely affected by the situation which has been created by the activities of the Tennessee Valley Authority. But, because of that very difficulty, and because of the legal principle involved, it seems to me that we should not enact this proposed legislation at this time. I have reluctantly come to that conclusion, for I had hoped that we would be able to achieve some formula, some yardstick.

Subsequently Mr. DANAHER asked and obtained unanimous consent to have Judge Eblen's statement printed in the RECORD at this point, as follows:

STATEMENT OF ELMER L. EBLEN, COUNTY JUDGE OF ROANE COUNTY, TENN., TO THE AGRICULTURAL SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I appear as county judge of Roane County, Tenn., and as a member of the legislative committee of the County Judges Association of Tennessee. In Tennessee the county judges are the fiscal and financial agents of the counties.

I will first take up the matter of Roane County's losses by reason of the selling of the Tennessee Power Co. to the Tennessee Valley Authority. This utility was assessed for the sum of $783,130, which brings in revenue each year in the sum of $23,982. None of this amount has been replaced, although the Tennessee Valley Authority is now operating through power departments at Harriman and Rockwood, Tenn., and furnish electricity for the total of the county, and have set aside 12½ percent for the payment and replacement of these taxes.

Besides this, the building of Watts Bar Dam will take a lot of our best land and will also take two railroads, which in all probability will not be replaced. Our assessment at this time is $9,231,000. It has been estimated by our tax assessor, trustee, and myself that we will lose in the basin area about $1,750,000 of which will take approximately 25 percent of our total valuation. This, of course, includes the utility loss. The estimate is not exact on the basin area of the Watts Bar Dam for the reason that they have not yet purchased the reservoir lands.

It has been said that the citizenship of this area is compensated for their tax loss by their saving in their electric bills. Our estimate on our county shows the following: That about 35 percent of our citizenship are users of electricity. Many of those who use electricity are not home owners. A few of the farmers who are nearby to the cities have electricity, but in our county not over 2 percent of the farmers have any electricity. The other 65 percent of our citizenship gets no saving at all because they are not users of electricity; and as I have heretofore stated, the electric current is furnished to us directly from the power departments of Harriman and Rockwood, Tenn., in this county, and the rural sections are unable to get electric power for the reason that these departments are not interested in building lines in the rural sections, because the same furnishes them no profit. The lowest rate per mile that they asked is $12 per mile. With the payment for the current this makes it so that they cannot purchase the same. What I mean by $12 per mile is that they require that there be enough subscribers on the line to make a total payment of $12 per month per mile. Of course, many of the small farmers would be unable to take electricity at the present prices if there was no guaranty asked. So the saving in electricity brings only profit to about 35 percent of our county, and the other 65 percent being the farmers and the small-home owners. It is upon the small-home owners and small farmers that the raise in their State and county taxes will most effect, because the basin area of the Watts Bar Dam takes the major portion of the best farms in this county, as well as in the other counties through which it passes. These people are already overburdened with taxation and cannot stand a raise in their taxes, and it is for this class that we plead.

As to the loss through the State, as you know there has been a total loss of $1,500,000 to the counties on the generation of electric current and other matters, which might be remedied by our State legislature, which has taken no action. There will be a loss of something like $20,000,000 in assessment by reason of the basin area to be taken by Guntersville Dam, Watts Bar Dam, and Coulter Shoals Dam, and the lands that have already been taken by the building of Norris Dam, which places many of the counties of this State in chaos and upsets their financial structures for the reason that they have become heavily involved in debts heretofore, and the persons and corporations which they owe bought their indebtedness upon the theory that they had these properties subject to taxation; and now it seems likely and probable that by 1942 that in the basin area there will be at least $14,000,000 worth of default in county obligations if there is not some remedy given whereby the counties can supply their losses from the sale of these utilities and from the loss of the lands in the basin area. It is the most serious question in the line of taxation that has affected Tennessee in a generation.

In Tennessee we have a 8-month school terms, and it is most probable that this cannot be carried out unless some tax-replacement bill is passed which makes a substantial replacement of the taxes due both the State and counties. And we are of the opinion that many of the counties of Tennessee by the year 1942 will have only 4- or 5-month school terms unless some step to the effect is taken. It is our understanding that the Tennessee Valley Authority in the contracts made with these municipalities has asked them to set aside 12½ percent for State, county, and municipality taxes. This being true, we see no reason why that some replacement bill should not be passed; and that it should be as adequate as the finances will allow; and, of course, it should be taken from the users of electricity.

It further seems most evident to us that the amounts should be paid directly to the taxing units affected. We find that there would be less red tape and that the money would be more liable to reach the counties, the States, and municipalities without any overhead expense, if it was paid directly to those entitled thereto.

We most respectfully ask and petition your committee to report the best bill possible. We would not attempt to dictate to your honorable committee and to the Members of Congress, but have tried to set out the plight of the various counties of Tennessee and how they are affected; and rely upon you gentlemen to follow the best method possible.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, in Alabama, as has been testified, the situation was so differently handled from the way it was handled in Tennessee, as to suggest that it is still inherently a State problem. If distress temporarily continues in some affected counties in Tennessee, I believe the very existence of the distress will call forth a remedy that can be applied locally, and that the money that is being collected today under the authority of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, and which is being allocated to the States, would now, and properly hereafter, be allocable within the States by the States themselves.

It seems to me, taking that view of the question, that we should not pass this particular legislation. As I said a while since, I make this statement reluctantly, for the reason that I had hoped, as a result of my conferences with the Senator from Nebraska and of my own attention to the subject, that we could work out some way to handle this situation and provide a proper yardstick adequate for the local situation and properly; but I have found personally that there is no adequate remedy at hand, and I believe that the pending bill suggests no proper one. Therefore, Mr. President, I will personally be obliged to vote against this amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Connecticut, I desire to say that I have appreciated his earnestness and his fairness in attempting to arrive at what he believes to be a just conclusion upon some of the complicated matters involved in the bill, which on its face seems to be a rather simple one. The Senator has just said in effect, and has said to me often privately, that the bill, as it was introduced by me, is better without the committee amendments than with them. I will not quarrel with the Senator on that question as an abstract proposition. I want to explain to the Senator, and to the Senate, why the committee amendments have been suggested, and why they have been approved unanimously, not only by the subcommittee, but by the full committee itself.

The original bill, without the amendments, provided, as the Senator has stated, that the money which is proposed to be paid in lieu of taxes to any given State should be paid by the T. V. A. to the State itself, and that the State should divide it up as it pleased. It was believed that the State would divide it up in the same manner as it would if it were actually tax money. We must always bear in mind that the money in question is not tax money, because we have to go through the formula at least of refusing to admit that local authorities can tax the property of the Federal Government. I think that is agreed to by everybody.

The several counties in the various States involved have asked for the amendments because the original act provided in section 3 for payments of money in lieu of taxes to two States, Alabama and Tennessee. I think it was the intention of Congress, without any doubt, that when the money was paid to the States—and it has been so paid ever since the T. V. A. Act has been enforced—the States would do just what the Senator from Connecticut has suggested; that by proper legislation they would divide the money up among the counties. But experience has shown that the States did not do it, and therefore various persons and organizations, coming from the counties, and representing the interests of the counties, have appeared before the committee, and have shown what we knew to be true, that the counties heretofore have gotten nothing from the States of Alabama and Tennessee because those States did not, through their legislatures, provide for the division of this money among the counties in which the property was located. The result was that the States got the money, and the counties suffered the loss.

When the T. V. A. bought the property of the Tennessee Electric Power Co. they acquired a great many generating systems and many transmission lines, and in connection with that contract the municipalities bought the distributing systems of the Tennessee Electric Power Co. The Tennessee Electric Power Co. owned the generating systems, the transmission lines, and the distribution systems in the various municipalities themselves. Then the municipalities bought the distributing systems, and the T. V. A. bought the remainder of the property, consisting of generating systems and transmission lines.

That the States should divide up this money was undoubtedly the object of Congress originally, and it is the object in the pending legislation. In fact, it is so stated in the bill, but it can only be stated as the intention of Congress, for it is admitted that Congress cannot say to the States what legislation they shall pass. If Congress expressed, as the original bill provided, its intention that the States should divide up this money, the States would not be legally bound to pay any attention to it. And since they have not done it in the past, the taxpayers' leagues, and the county organizations, and the State organizations, and county judges, called the attention of the committee to the fact that the States have not done what it was intended they should do, and that the purchase of the properties of the Tennessee Electric Power Co. has resulted in adding to the embarrassment, if I may call it that, heretofore existing in regard to the money the Tennessee Valley Authority should pay in lieu of taxes, by virtue of original section 13, and they said, "Our experience shows that the people who ought to get the money paid in lieu of taxes will not, under this bill, get it."

I am in entire sympathy with their position. I think the States ought to pay the money as suggested. The original bill provided that they should. But when I am confronted with the fact that the States may not do so, and that in the past they have not done so, then I am moved by a desire to assist those counties by the adoption of appropriate amendments. Some of the counties are hard hit under present conditions, and some of them will be in such a dilemma as to make it almost impossible for them to meet their indebtedness, indeed, to meet their ordinary running expenses. That will only occur in very few counties, but it will occur in some.

In order to obviate this difficulty I have favored, as the committee has favored, the proposed amendments, so as to provide that the T. V. A., instead of paying the States, shall pay the counties or the units of the States where taxes are as a rule paid, unless there is some State law to the contrary.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HILL. In my State of Alabama, for instance, the counties collect not only the county taxes, but also taxes for the State.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. That is also true in my State.

Mr. HILL. The county is the tax-collecting unit for the county and for the State. The county machinery collects not only the county taxes but also the State taxes. In Alabama there is really no machinery for the State to collect taxes for the counties and then distribute the money to the counties. All the machinery is in reverse. The counties collect both the county and State taxes, and then the counties turn over to the State the State taxes which have been collected for the State.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The same thing is true in Tennessee.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I merely wish to make an inquiry or two.

I notice on page 4 the provision that the determination of the Board of the amounts due shall be final. I have assumed that the Board referred to is the Board of Directors of the T. V. A.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I do not have before me the language to which the Senator refers, but I think I am familiar with it.

Mr. ADAMS. It is on page 4, line 13.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, it refers to the T. V. A. Board.

Mr. ADAMS. Another inquiry: As I gather from reading the bill, it provides that the T. V. A. shall pay the equivalent of twice the taxes that were paid annually upon the particular property in preceding years.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not understand that there is any such provision in the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. As I read it, the minimum annual payment to each State shall be not less than an amount equal to the 2-year average.

Mr. NORRIS. It is an average.

Mr. ADAMS. I see.

Mr. NORRIS. The amount paid shall be not less than the average of the taxes privately paid in the 2 preceding years.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. I do not wish to drag in an outside matter which may not have been considered. If it has been considered, I should like to ask the Senator about it.

As I understand, the bill would require the T. V. A. to pay taxes on its plant, according to the method provided in the bill. Is that correct?

Mr. NORRIS. Not entirely. The object of the bill is to provide that the T. V. A. shall pay an amount equal to what the taxes would be upon that part of its property which relates to the generation or transmission of electricity. It is not intended that it shall pay any other sum for taxes on other property.

Mr. MINTON. I think I now understand correctly. Suppose the municipalities in the State of Alabama own generating plants, distribution plants, and so forth, and are not required to pay any taxes on the municipal plants: Was any consideration given to the matter of not applying the law to States which do not require their own municipal plants to pay taxes?

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the language, the States would all be treated alike, whether or not taxes have heretofore been paid on municipally owned property.

Mr. MINTON. Does the Senator think that if certain States exempt their municipal plants, the Federal Government ought to have to pay taxes on its plants in those States?

Mr. NORRIS. There might be an honest disagreement on that question. My own idea is, and always has been, that if the T. V. A. takes over property which heretofore has been taxed, or if the T. V. A. itself constructs property, or takes it over from some prior owner for the purpose of performing a function from which the T. V. A. makes a profit as a private individual would make a profit, it ought to pay a sum equal to what it would pay in taxes if the property were privately owned and taxes were being paid on it.

I do not mean to say that the proposition I have just laid down is absolute, or that there may not be a good argument in favor of certain exceptions. However, it has always seemed to me to be fair. I believe that a municipally owned generating and distribution system, confined entirely to a municipality, ought to pay a sum equal to what would be paid as taxes if the property were privately owned.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Is it not true that in the sale of power by the T. V. A. to a municipality in which the distribution system is owned by the municipality, and the municipality distributes the power, there is a provision in the contract for fixing rates which will provide such a return to the municipality as to enable it to make a payment in lieu not only of municipal taxes but also of State and county taxes?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HILL. That is the procedure in the Tennessee Valley area today.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the fact that the T. V. A. Act gives authority to the T. V. A. Board to fix the resale rates; and under that provision the T. V. A. may fix the rates which a municipality may charge to its consumers. Before the fixing of the wholesale rates by which the T. V. A. sells power to municipalities and of the local rates charged the ultimate consumers by the municipality they were the subject of a couple of years of careful study and analysis by the best experts the T. V. A. could obtain. The wholesale rates now charged by the T. V. A. to municipalities, and also the resale rates charged by the municipalities to their consumers or citizens, have been fixed after study, and all the tax items have been included in the rates. So it is not contemplated that any new rates will be established. However, if we assume that the wholesale rate fixed as a result of the study heretofore made is 7 mills per kilowatt-hour, before that conclusion was reached consideration was given to all the items constituting the cost of generating and transmitting electricity, and a rate was fixed which would pay not only that cost but in addition thereto a tax upon that cost.

Mr. HILL. As the Senator says, when the word "tax" is used, it includes not only the municipal tax but also the county tax and the State tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HILL. All the taxes.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HILL. On exactly the same basis on which any private power company would pay.

Mr. NORRIS. Ad valorem taxes.

Mr. HILL. Ad valorem taxes.

Mr. NORRIS. I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the fact that the taxes we are trying to take care of, and which we think the bill will take care of, are all ad valorem taxes. For instance, I understand that the Legislature of the State of Tennessee has imposed certain other kinds of taxes levied against generating systems. The bill will not take care of those. It is not intended to do so. It is intended to take care of all taxes on property used in the generation, transmission, and distribution of electricity. The bill provides that the T. V. A. shall pay a sum of money equal to the amount it would pay as taxes if it were a private corporation and owned the same property.

I wonder if I have made myself clear to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. I quite understand the Senator from Nebraska, and I thank him for his help. However, with reference to the situation in Alabama, does the Senator recall the testimony of Mr. Lapsley before the committee, to the effect that the ad valorem tax in Alabama is only 50 percent?

Mr. Lapsley said:

> And therefore, if the bill is presently confined to ad valorem tax losses, and then if dams and all improvements on the dam properties or locations are excluded, you can well see that it would look like Alabama was getting more than she is entitled to, and yet if you give us all of our ad valorem taxes, we still have got a 50 percent tax loss. Of course, the cities can make up theirs but the counties and States will have to look to these payments from T. V. A.

The situation exhibited by Mr. Lapsley's explanation of the picture in Alabama is described by Mr. Lapsley as follows:

> Alabama feels that if the new formula does not materially reduce the payments which are going to the State at this time, Alabama has no objection, no substantial objection, to the formula.

According to Mr. Lapsley's explanation, under the formula proposed, we have a set of circumstances which will do justice in Tennessee, but not in Alabama.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Speaking of Mr. Lapsley, he is counsel for the State Department of Revenue of the State of Alabama; and with reference to this legislation he not only represented the State department of revenue, but was also the personal representative of the Governor of Alabama. I have a letter from Mr. Lapsley, under date of March 22 last, in which he states that this legislation is entirely satisfactory to him, representing the State of Alabama, its revenue department, and its Governor, and suggests two or three minor perfecting amendments, with which the Senator from Nebraska is familiar, and about which I understand there is no dispute. So, as the representative of the State of Alabama, he gives his approval to this proposed legislation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I may speak for Tennessee, the officials of Tennessee and the people of that State, so far as I know and believe, are entirely satisfied with the plan that has been worked out in this bill. I should like to point out to the Senator from Connecticut, if I may, while I am on my feet, the reason why the money is to be paid to the counties direct. It is largely because of the fact that there are only 12 counties out of the 95 in the State that are notably adversely affected—I may say that others are somewhat affected, but 12 are the notable ones—and the Senator can see how important it is to them.

For instance, Bledsoe County has total county taxes of $83,597, of which $17,226, or 21 percent, came from electric companies.

Bradley County had $249,862 in taxes, of which $30,744, or 12 percent, came from the electric companies.

Hickman County had $92,338 in taxes, of which $12,910, or 14 percent, came from electric companies.

Lewis County had $43,031 in taxes, of which $10,299, or 24 percent, came from the electric companies.

Marion County had $221,371 in taxes, of which $82,025 came from electric companies, or 37 percent.

McMinn County had $281,643 in taxes, of which $48,813, or 17 percent, came from electric companies.

The principal loser in the State was Polk County. That county had taxes of $265,772, of which $105,606, or 40 percent of its entire taxation, came from electric companies.

Sequatchie County had taxes of $33,326, of which $7,440, or 22 percent, came from electric companies.

Warren County had $109,790 in taxes, of which $36,780, or 34 percent, came from electric companies.

Wayne County had $77,537 in taxes, of which $18,792, or 24 percent, came from electric companies.

White County had $114,839 in taxes, of which $33,498, or 29 percent, came from the electric companies.

The Senator from Connecticut and other Senators can understand that, since the school systems of the various counties are so vitally affected by the large percentage of the tax money coming from the old electric companies, naturally they desire that the money should be paid directly to them, so that there may not be any doubt or question about it. It was for that reason that the counties in both Tennessee and Alabama requested the amendment to which reference has been made and to which the Senator from Nebraska very generously agreed. I think that is the best way to settle the question.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from Nebraska.

I want the Senator from Tennessee to understand that I have never been out of sympathy with the objectives the Senator from Nebraska has in mind.

Let me add further that no better statement has been made of the plight of the Tennessee counties than the one submitted by Judge Eblen to the Senate committee, and to which I made previous reference.

With the permission of the Senator from Nebraska, I should like to ask unanimous consent that at the point where I first referred to Judge Eblen's statement it be inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope that may be done.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, may we have the order made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Without objection, the matter referred to will be placed in the RECORD as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut.

The matter referred to appears at the proper place in Mr. DANAHER'S earlier remarks.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, Roane County, referred to by Judge Eblen, is also affected. I should like to call attention to page 372 of the hearings before the House Committee on Military Affairs, from which I took the figures I referred to a few moments ago. I ask that the table may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

STATE OF TENNESSEE

NOTE.—In addition the State tax rate on all property in the State is 8 cents per $100.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield for one further suggestion?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. I should like to address a question to the Senator from Tennessee, if I may. I should like to know if the present situation continues, involving, as Judge Eblen has pointed out, the possibility of a default on county bonds, let us say in 1942, assuming that the Congress takes no action in this matter, what will the State of Tennessee do for the affected counties? Will the State of Tennessee, in the Senator's judgment, allow those counties to continue to suffer?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I cannot say what may be done; I cannot speak for the State in that sense; but I think the pending proposal is manifestly just, and, inasmuch as taxes in such large degree came from the companies the Government has taken over, that out of the profits derived from the companies thus taken over, we should certainly provide that the counties shall receive money in lieu of the taxes which they have been in the habit of receiving from the companies, and thereby be able to carry on their schools and other activities.

I hope the Senator will agree that this very just bill may be passed, because I think everyone who studies it realizes, as the Senator from Connecticut expressed himself a moment or two ago, that the objectives of the bill—that is, the restoration of this money to the several counties—should be attained.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one other question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator. Let me say to the Senator from Tennessee that he has made reference in detail to the loss to the counties, but he has not made any reference whatever to the enormous benefits which certainly the activities of the Tennessee Valley Authority have brought to them. The improvement of navigation, the increment of land values, the creation of lakes, the reduced electric-utility rates for power and light, and other items must be reflected in enormously increased local values upon which the counties will have an opportunity to recoup. What steps are being taken in that direction?

Mr. McKELLAR. That remains entirely in the future. We do not as yet know what the benefits will be. We hope they may accrue, but certainly at the present time the counties ought to be recouped for their loss of taxation from the electric plants. I hope the Senator will allow it to be done.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from Nebraska for permitting the interruption.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me say, in conclusion, that while this is a short bill, and on its face it does not seem difficult, it is the result of a great deal of study by anxious, honest men who wanted to reach, tried to reach, and I think finally have reached a just and fair conclusion. The bill may be somewhat cumbersome; it is not in the form which would best suit me. I would agree with the Senator from Connecticut, if we were not faced with what seems to me to be an impracticable condition, that the bill as originally introduced was superior to the bill after the amendments have been agreed to. But we are faced with exasperating conditions which, in my opinion, the original bill would not fully meet. We are required, to begin with, to enact a general law dealing with seven different States, and there is no harmony between the laws of those several States. There are some to which I referred a while ago—Tennessee in particular—that have some other taxes that are not cared for. An examination of the hearings of the House committee will disclose that the Governor of Tennessee appeared there—he was invited also to appear before the Senate committee but thought it was unnecessary—and, as representing Tennessee, expressed himself as in favor of the proposed legislation. He would have been glad to have the Federal Government likewise take care of the special taxes which had been levied by the State of Tennessee against the generation and transmission of electricity; but while his testimony will show that he would like to have that money returned to the State of Tennessee—and it is perfectly natural that any citizen of Tennessee would favor that—he did not claim, when the question was put directly to him, at least, in any of the conversations I have had with him, that such a thing would be fair to the other States or to the Federal Government. He recognized specifically, as his testimony at different times will show, the great benefits that were coming to Tennessee, and he was careful to express the belief that he was not forgetting those benefits, and that he felt under great obligations, as it were, to the Federal Government because these various improvements had been made. But, after all, while in the particular I have just mentioned some of the representatives would prefer to receive other taxes than ad valorem taxes, they realized that that position would be unfair and could not be sustained in justice or in logic; and they therefore fully and heartily acquiesced in this particular bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 22, after the words "It is", to strike out "likewise"; in the same line, after the word "intended", to insert "by Congress"; and in line 23, after the word "shall", to strike out "in like manner redistribute" and insert "distribute", so as to read:

It is intended by Congress that each of the said States shall distribute all payments made in lieu of taxation paid to municipalities by municipal authorities as provided in contracts made for the purchase of power from the Corporation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who is necessarily absent, attending to a very important matter in the House of Representatives, I offer a pro forma amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 19, after the words "United States", it is proposed to strike out the period and add the words "for any purpose other than the resale thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. HILL. Surely.

Mr. DANAHER. Does the Senator from Nebraska agree to that amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see any objection to the amendment.

Mr. HILL. It does not change the intent and purpose of the language at all.

Mr. NORRIS. No. It is not the intention, of course, to have the language apply to resale.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HILL. On behalf of my colleague the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], I offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, lines 22, 23, and 24, and on page 5, lines 1 and 2, it is proposed to strike out the words appearing in said lines, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Nothing herein shall be construed to limit the authority of the Corporation, in its contracts for the sale of power to municipalities, to permit or provide for the resale of power at rates which may include an amount to cover tax-equivalent payments to the municipality in lieu of State, county, and municipal taxes upon any distribution system or property owned by the municipality, or any agency thereof, conditioned upon a proper distribution by the municipality of any amounts collected by it in lieu of State or county taxes upon any such distribution system or property, it being the intention of Congress that either the municipality or the State in which the municipality is situated shall provide for the proper distribution to the State and county of any portion of tax equivalent so collected by the municipality in lieu of State or county taxes upon any such distribution system or property.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama on behalf of his colleague.

Mr. HILL. I understand that this amendment also is agreeable to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I see no objection to it, and in fact I think it is a very good amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. On behalf of my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] I offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 5, line 6, after the word "States", it is proposed to insert the words "and counties."

The amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 5, line 6, it is proposed to strike out the words "and the redistribution."

The amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 5, line 10, after the word "States", it is proposed to insert the words "and counties", and in line 11 to strike out the words "and to the local subdivisions thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 5, line 13, it is proposed to strike out the words "local subdivisions" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "counties."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 2925) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 13 of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933 be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 13. In order to render financial assistance to those States and local governments in which the power operations of the Corporation are carried on and in which the Corporation has acquired properties previously subject to State and local taxation, the Board is authorized and directed to pay to said States, and the counties therein, for each fiscal year, beginning July 1, 1940, the following percentages of the gross proceeds derived from the sale of power by the Corporation for the preceding fiscal year as hereinafter provided, together with such additional amounts as may be payable pursuant to the provisions hereinafter set forth, said payments to constitute a charge against the power operations of the Corporation: For the fiscal year (beginning July 1) 1940, 10 percent; 1941, 9 percent; 1942, 8 percent; 1943, 7½ percent; 1944, 7 percent; 1945, 6½ percent; 1946, 6 percent; 1947, 5½ percent; 1948 and each fiscal year thereafter, 5 percent. 'Gross proceeds', as used in this section, is defined as the total gross proceeds derived by the Corporation from the sale of power for the preceding fiscal year, excluding power used by the Corporation or sold or delivered to any other department or agency of the Government of the United States for any purpose other than the resale thereof. The payments herein authorized are in lieu of taxation, and the Corporation, its property, franchises, and income, are hereby expressly exempted from taxation in any manner or form by any State, county, municipality, or any subdivision or district thereof.

"The payment for each fiscal year shall be apportioned among said States in the following manner: One-half of said payment shall be apportioned by paying to each State the percentage thereof which the gross proceeds of the power sales by the Corporation within said State during the preceding fiscal year bears to the total gross proceeds from all power sales by the Corporation during the preceding fiscal year; the remaining one-half of said payment shall be apportioned by paying to each State the percentage thereof which the book value of the power property held by the Corporation within said State at the end of the preceding fiscal year bears to the total book value of all such property held by the Corporation on the same date. The book value of power property shall include that portion of the investment allocated or estimated to be allocable to power: Provided, That the minimum annual payment to each State (including payments to counties therein) shall not be less than an amount equal to the 2-year average of the State and local ad valorem property taxes levied against power property purchased and operated by the Corporation in said State and against that portion of reservoir lands related to dams constructed by or on behalf of the United States Government and held or operated by the Corporation and allocated or estimated to be allocable to power. The said 2-year average shall be calculated for the last 2 tax years during which said property was privately owned and operated or said land was privately owned: Provided further, That the minimum annual payment to each State in which the Corporation owns and operates power property (including payments to counties therein) shall not be less than $10,000 in any case: Provided further, That the Corporation shall pay directly to the respective counties the 2-year average of county ad valorem property taxes (including taxes levied by taxing districts within the respective counties) upon power property and reservoir lands allocable to power, determined as above provided, and all payments to any such county within a State shall be deducted from the payment otherwise due to such State under the provisions of this section. The determination of the Board of the amounts due hereunder to the respective States and counties shall be final.

"The payments above provided shall in each case be made to the State or county in equal monthly installments beginning not later than July 31, 1940.

"It is intended by Congress that each of the said States shall distribute all payments made in lieu of taxation paid to municipalities by municipal authorities as provided in contracts made for the purchase of power from the Corporation.

"The Corporation shall, not later than January 1, 1945, submit to the Congress a report on the operation of the provisions of this section, including a statement of the distribution to the various States and counties hereunder by the States of the amounts paid to them; the effect of the operation of the provisions of this section on State and local finances; an appraisal of the benefits of the program of the Corporation to the States and counties receiving payments hereunder, and the effect of such benefits in increasing taxable values within such States and counties; and such other data, information, and recommendations as may be pertinent to future legislation."

PROHIBITION OF FOREIGN SILVER PURCHASES

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 785.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the title of the bill for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 785) to repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 to provide for the sale of silver, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Donahey	King	Schwellenbach
Ashurst	Downey	La Follette	Sheppard
Bailey	Ellender	Lucas	Shipstead
Bankhead	Frazier	Lundeen	Slattery
Barkley	George	McKellar	Smathers

Clark, Mo.	Holt	Reed	Walsh
Connally	Hughes	Reynolds	Wheeler
Danaher	Johnson, Calif.	Russell	White
Davis	Johnson, Colo.	Schwartz	Wiley

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 785) to repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, to provide for the sale of silver, and for other purposes, which had been reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That all power and authority of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury under the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 with respect to the acquisition of foreign silver shall cease and terminate on the date of enactment of this act; and all proclamations, orders, rules, regulations, and other action promulgated, made, issued, or taken by the President or the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to foreign silver pursuant to any power or authority so terminated shall cease to be effective on and after such date: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to limit the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire and make payment for foreign silver purchased or contracted for prior to the date of enactment of this act.

SEC. 2. Section 1805 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the tax on transfers of any interest in silver bullion) is hereby repealed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred in January 1939 the bill S. 785, to repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, and for other purposes, after public hearings and extensive consideration, on March 20, 1940, reported the bill favorably, with amendments, and recommended that the bill in its amended form be passed. The vote in the committee was 14 to 4, constituting a very strong endorsement of my bill, and, incidentally, a distinctly nonpartisan endorsement, which I appreciate. I send to the desk a copy of Senate Report No. 1332, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to whom was referred the bill (S. 785) to repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, to provide for the sale of silver, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with amendments and recommend that the bill, as amended, do pass.

STATEMENT

The bill (S. 785) was introduced on January 17, 1939, and referred to your committee. In its original form it provided for: (1) The repeal of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 and of all power and authority of the executive branch of the Government to acquire silver; (2) the setting aside of 500,000,000 ounces of silver to meet future subsidiary coinage requirements; (3) the sale of the remainder of the Government stock of silver; (4) the prohibition of imports of foreign silver; and (5) the appropriation of $250,000 to be used by the Bureau of Standards in research with respect to new industrial uses of silver.

Your committee has given extensive consideration to the bill and held public hearings on it in April 1939. A report on the bill was made by a subcommittee to the committee on February 13, 1940, and a substitute proposal was recommended. The Secretary of the Treasury was heard on March 19, 1940.

The substitute reported by the committee provides that (1) all power and authority of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury under the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 with respect to the acquisition of foreign silver shall cease and terminate; and (2) section 1805 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the tax on transfers of any interest in silver bullion) shall be immediately repealed. There is a qualifying proviso, however, that nothing in the act is to be construed to limit the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire and make payment for foreign silver purchased or contracted for prior to the date of enactment of the act; but, except as so qualified, it is contemplated that all acquisitions of foreign silver by the United States shall cease.

A proposal similar in effect to that contained in the substitute being reported by the committee (except with respect to the tax on transfers and without the qualifying proviso just mentioned) was approved by the Senate on June 26, 1939, but was subsequently eliminated in conference.

The main reasons against the continued buying of foreign silver are as follows:

(1) It is unnecessary: The monetary base supporting the currency and banking system has expanded alarmingly since the passage of the Silver Purchase Act in 1934, due to gold and silver purchases by the Government. The country's gold stock, following the devaluation of the dollar in January 1934, had a monetary value totaling about $7,018,000,000. Today the country's stock of gold has a monetary value of about $18,300,000,000.

(2) It imperils the future domestic buying power of the dollar: Reserves held in the Federal Reserve System, swollen by the issuance of gold certificates and silver certificates, are now about $12,500,000,000, which is $5,877,000,000[1] in excess of legal requirements. The last annual report of the Federal Reserve System, for example, emphatically called to the attention of Congress the dangers involved.[2]

(3) It is wasteful of American resources: The purchase of foreign silver by the United States involves bestowing buying power on foreigners and, therefore ultimately, the exchange of American goods and services for imported silver. In the last analysis, payment for imported silver is made with American wealth. The silver certificates or dollars foreigners receive for the silver they sell to the United States may be spent here for airplanes, motorcars, cotton, apples, or any other American product. It would be more in this country's interest to give away American products to Americans at home, rather than to exchange our products for silver which can never be resold abroad except at a great loss. If there were any validity to the argument that the purchase of foreign silver should be continued "because by giving foreigners purchasing power, it makes jobs for American producers of export commodities," it would be a logical step to increase our buying price for silver fivefold or tenfold, and thereby make five or ten times as many jobs for Americans.

(4) It involves bestowal of benefits abroad without considerations of reciprocity: Any foreign country or individual sending silver to the United States benefits from the existing American program, which makes no discrimination in the advantages it bestows. Under this program for example, Japan, Russia, Italy, Germany, Spain, and Mexico have benefited, while those countries were pursuing policies frowned upon by the American people.

(5) There is no prospect of fulfilling the treadmill terms of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934: The 1934 act states that silver must be purchased until the monetary value of the country's stock of silver (valued for the purpose at $1.2929+ per fine ounce) equals one-fourth of the total monetary value of the gold and silver (the gold being valued at $35 per fine ounce). Despite the purchase of more than 2,200,000,000 ounces[3] of silver since the act was passed, at a cost of more than $1,000,000,000, the inflow of gold has been so great that the Silver Purchase Act today requires further silver purchases greater in the aggregate than the 1,332,000,000 ounces required to be added at the time it was passed in June 1934.

(6) The Silver Purchase Act is a demonstrable failure: (a) The Silver Purchase Act of 1934 has not achieved the objects which its sponsors promised in 1934. It has not raised the world price of silver to $1.29 an ounce. Instead, the so-called world price of foreign silver, despite the tremendous purchases of recent years and continuing support, since last July has been 22 percent lower than the average price in June 1934, and notwithstanding the additional fact that the United States Treasury is today absorbing the entire domestic production constituting more than one-fifth of the world's mine production of silver. Under the foreign silver program the United States has cleaned up the vast supplies of demonetized and other old silver in Europe, Asia, and elsewhere. (b) The American silver program has not encouraged other countries to imitate its example and restore silver to a place alongside gold as a basic monetary metal and settler of international balances of payments. On the contrary, the American silver program actually has financed the demonetization of silver coin abroad and the abandonment of the silver standard in its last stronghold, China. (c) The American silver program has not been the promised panacea in "eliminating unemployment," "restoring prosperity," "raising the general level of commodity prices," remedying the "maldistribution of gold," causing "tariff restrictions to vanish," "restoring the peoples' purchasing power," "stabilizing the exchanges," enabling China to "buy our bathtubs, our shoes, and our shirts," and so forth.

(7) Silver buying is not a proper instrument of foreign policy: Virtually the only defense of the present program being made currently is that the buying of foreign silver is a means of carrying out the good-neighbor policy in Latin America, yet it is clear from the statistics that 18 of the 20 Latin American countries either produce only insignificant amounts of silver or produce none at all. The outstanding beneficiary of the American silver program today is Mexico, the world's foremost silver-producing country. Yet, obviously, this country's uninterrupted purchasing of Mexican-produced silver since 1934 has not produced in Mexico the results which might be expected from such purchases viewed as a good-neighbor effort.

Since foreign-silver buying inflates and complicates this country's monetary system its continuance cannot be defended as a proper instrument of foreign policy. If it is advisable and necessary to try to purchase good will abroad, some way should be sought that will not involve the soundness of our own monetary system.

(8) There is no other government in the world that maintains a market for the world's silver: This alone should be a decisive reason for abandoning the purchasing of foreign silver, if, indeed, the general rejection of bimetallism was not a good reason for never embarking upon silver purchases.

(9) Foreign silver buying by the United States is a burden on every American: Although no budgetary appropriation is required for foreign silver purchases, since the law authorizes the Treasury to finance the purchases by issuing silver certificates (a process of inflation), the dollars received by the sellers of silver are spent in competition with the earnings of every American. The foreign seller of silver receives in exchange for his silver certificates some form of American wealth or services paid for in the final analysis by every holder of dollars. The American day laborer and the pensioner, the school teacher and the farmer, the people of the West and the East all help pay the real cost of the foreign silver program.

(10) The foreign silver program has been repeatedly condemned: During the past year and more the buying of foreign silver has been repeatedly condemned in uncounted editorials in newspapers in every State in the Union, regardless of party. Not a single editorial favoring the present foreign silver program has come to your committee's attention. The program has been condemned unequivocally on various occasions by numerous economists, by the Federal Advisory Council of the Federal Reserve System, by the Northwest Mining Congress, by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, by the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System in his testimony on S. 785, etc.

(11) The stock of monetary silver has been greatly expanded: Since 1934 there has been a more than threefold expansion in the monetary stock of silver held by the United States, which stock in January 1940 had a "monetary value" of more than $3,800,000,000.

(12) There is no reason for further delay: The fact that it is planned to study the monetary and banking policies of the United States prior to the next session of Congress is no reason for delaying repeal of a costly program which has been so widely condemned and the lack of necessity for which has been so clearly demonstrated.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, in June 1939 the Senate, by an overwhelming voice vote, went on record as favoring discontinuance of the Government's foreign silver program. After this Senate action was reversed in the conference of last summer on the monetary bill—House bill 3325—the subject was again brought to a vote in the Senate, and, by the narrow margin of three votes, action was again delayed, following the eloquent plea by our esteemed late colleague from Idaho, Senator Borah, that the Senate postpone action until receipt of a recommendation by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. Now that committee has spoken, and its nonpartisan recommendation has received wide acclaim throughout the country.

The Senate bill as proposed to be amended provides, first, all power and authority of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury under the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 with respect to the acquisition of foreign silver shall cease and terminate; and, second, section 1805 of the Internal Revenue Code—relating to the tax on transfers of any interest in silver bullion—shall be immediately repealed. There is a qualifying proviso, however, that nothing in the act is to be construed to limit the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire and make payments for foreign silver purchased or contracted for prior to the date of enactment of the act; but, except as so qualified, it is contemplated that all acquisitions of foreign silver by the United States shall cease.

In asking discontinuance of the present foreign-silver buying I can do no better than to cite a dozen good reasons as given in Senate Report No. 1332 of March 20:

First. It is unnecessary.

Second. It imperils the future domestic buying power of the dollar.

Third. It is wasteful of American resources.

Fourth. It involves bestowal of benefits abroad without considerations of reciprocity.

Fifth. There is no prospect of fulfilling the treadmill terms of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934.

Sixth. The Silver Purchase Act is a demonstrable failure.

Seventh. Silver buying is not a proper instrument of foreign policy.

Eighth. There is no other government in the world that maintains a market for the world's silver.

Ninth. Foreign-silver buying by the United States is a burden on every American.

Tenth. The foreign-silver program has been repeatedly condemned.

Eleventh. The stock of monetary silver has been greatly expanded.

Twelfth. There is no reason for further delay.

In Senate Report No. 1332 each of these reasons is supported briefly by facts. For further facts I refer to the published hearings of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, a copy of which has been sent to each Senator. Part 1 of the hearings contains the testimony of expert witnesses who testified before the committee. This testimony as it relates to foreign silver I have myself summarized and thus condensed; it appears on pages 182–184 of part 2 of the hearings on Senate bill 785. I call attention to the testimony of the Honorable Marriner S. Eccles, Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, in favor of my bill.

Mr. President, I also urge careful note of the universal approbation of the purpose of my bill in newspaper editorials throughout the country during the past year and more, as evidenced by typical excerpts printed on pages 198–239 of the hearings. This support has come from all sections of the country—North, South, East, and West, including the mining States. This newspaper support also has been nonpartisan in nature. Perhaps the strongest editorial support I have had has been from the Scripps-Howard newspapers.

I call attention, furthermore, to the endorsement which my bill has received from the Federal Advisory Council of the Federal Reserve System, as printed on pages 239 to 240 of the hearings. That council represents all 12 of the Federal Reserve districts.

Apart from the broad general purpose of Senate bill 785, namely, termination of foreign-silver purchases, the repeal of the silver-profits tax, which the bill would accomplish, would reverse the action taken in this respect when the buying of foreign silver was authorized in 1934. Section 2 of my bill would end the special tax on silver trading. Concerning it I have received much complaint since introducing Senate bill 785, and I have heard no reason for retaining it. There is no doubt in my mind that the cost of administration in the collecting of this tax has been entirely out of proportion to the revenue collected.

When the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 was passed and when the amount of silver estimated to be required by its terms was one and one-third billion ounces, the Secretary of the Treasury informed the Ways and Means Committee that "it is perfectly possible the Government might get as much as $25,000,000" revenue from this tax. (Hearings, Silver Purchase Act of 1934, May 25, 1934, p. 9.)

What actually has been the result? Instead of buying only one and one-third billion ounces of silver, the Treasury already has acquired about two and one-third billion ounces, with absolutely no end yet in sight. Yet on March 20, 1940, the Secretary of the Treasury reported to the Senate Banking and Currency Committee that actual revenue under the 50-percent silver-profits tax has been only $3,003,197 since June 1934. (Hearings to repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, pt. 2, p. 160.)

As explained by the Treasury in 1934, the special silver-profits tax was incorporated in the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 to protect the Government from competitive buying by speculators. The Secretary of the Treasury stated in 1934, before the act was passed, "The only other person who might be buying and selling silver would be the speculator." (Hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee, p. 9.) If foreign-silver buying is ended, no such protection will be needed. Moreover, the tax has worked a hardship on manufacturers who need to buy and sell silver in the course of their business. This hardship has lain not so much in the amount of the tax collected as in the costly bookkeeping involved.

A Member of the House of Representatives brings to my attention a long letter from one of his constituents dealing with his silver-tax tribulations. The constituent is a bona fide manufacturer of silverware. One day a Treasury representative walked in to look over the record of his silver transactions. I now quote from the manufacturer's letter:

> He [the Treasury agent] spent a week at the ——— Hotel, kept somebody here at the office busy with him for the week checking, taking out all the purchases since 1934 and the settlements of every one of them, and with the grand result that he found that the little rise of a couple of cents over a couple of days during which we happened to ship a very small lot of scrap, the profit being the large sum of $30, of which we were taxed $15 by the Government and paid.

Institution of the silver-profits tax played into the hands of the silver brokers to the disadvantage of our own. Under date of March 16, 1940, a New York bullion broker wrote to the members of the Banking and Currency Committee:

> I estimate that the United States Treasury has paid out to foreign silver brokers, particularly in London, while the 50-percent silver-profit tax has been in effect from 1934 to 1940, probably around $750,000 in commission.

A different example of the queer and unintended effects of this tax, as a result of which a vessel brings silver on its inbound voyage and immediately carries the same metal abroad on its out-bound voyage was reported in the New York Journal of Commerce of March 17, 1939, under the title, "Silver Users Take Profits in London."

Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an editorial entitled "Silver and Tin," published in the Washington Daily News of April 29, 1940.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

SILVER AND TIN

> The Townsend bill, to stop the Treasury's endless buying of unneeded foreign silver at premium prices, is expected to come up in the Senate this week. It should be passed.
> For some reason—possibly because Senator TOWNSEND is a Republican—the administration seems to be against the bill.
> There is no sense in this continued purchasing of a metal with which we are already swamped, particularly when we are doing little or nothing toward accumulating metals that we could hardly get along without—tin, for instance, of which there is only about 10 weeks' supply in this country.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, after all the debate which has taken place in recent months it should be perfectly clear that my bill, which does not touch domestic silver at all, has as its sole object the termination of the buying of foreign silver, which is a wasteful, unnecessary, pointless, and disturbing process. The case has long been clear. The hearings have been held. The Secretary of the Treasury has been heard. The State Department interposes no objection. The Federal Reserve System approves. Repeal is long overdue. The country waits. I am ready for the Senate to vote on Senate bill 785.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a number of Senators who are interested in the pending bill in one way or another were under the impression that the consideration of the T. V. A. measure would consume all the afternoon. Therefore they are not prepared this afternoon to go on with the measure now before the Senate. In addition to that, we have a gentleman's understanding that the bill will not be voted on until the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] shall return. I understand he will be back tonight. So it is obvious we cannot dispose of this measure today. I do not like to ask Senators to proceed with their arguments earlier than they had expected to do so. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] has indicated that, so far as he is concerned, he is entirely agreeable to have the bill go over until tomorrow. I think that is the best thing we can do right now.

For that reason I move that we proceed to consider executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. MCKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee on Commerce, reported favorably the following nominations:

Thomas M. Woodward, of Pennsylvania, to be a member of the United States Maritime Commission for the term of 6 years from September 26, 1939, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate (reappointment); and Rear Admiral Russell R. Waesche, of Maryland, to be commandant, with the rank of read admiral, in the Coast Guard of the United States for a term of 4 years (reappointment).

Mr. BAILEY, also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers in the Coast Guard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James P. Leamy to be United States district judge for the district of Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of A. Miles Pratt to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 20, with headquarters at New Orleans, La.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters on the calendar are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, May 1, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 30 (legislative day of April 24), 1940

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

James P. Leamy to be United States district judge for the district of Vermont.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

A. Miles Pratt to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 20, with headquarters at New Orleans, La.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, APRIL 30, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, offered the following prayer:

Our Father, who art in heaven, whose goodness faileth never, hallowed be Thy name. Condescend, we pray Thee, to hear our prayer. We pray for the presence of Him who is the inspiration of the worthiest thought and action. We praise Thee that back of this marvelous world house, back of our joys and afflictions, back of our problems and perplexities, back of earth's prayers and longings is a good God who has never known defeat. We earnestly beseech Thee to clothe us with the power of those virtues—faith and hope—which conquers doubt, subdues fear, and destroys hate. Amid the torturing conditions of earth may we turn to the will of God for spiritual reinforcement and harken unto His word: For it is written, as I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess to God; glory be to Thy name, O Lord most high. In our dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 9007. An act making appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, and related independent agencies, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. MCCARRAN, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. O'MAHONEY, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. BRIDGES to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2688. An act to amend section 4884 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 35, sec. 40); and

S. J. Res. 252. Joint Resolution to amend section 5 (b) of the act of October 6, 1917, as amended, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. GIBSON members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of executive papers in the following departments and agencies:

1. Department of Commerce.
2. Department of War.
3. Administrative Office of the United States Courts.
4. Federal Security Agency.
5. Federal Trade Commission.
6. Federal Works Agency.
7. Office of the United States marshal, eastern district of Wisconsin.
8. United States Civil Service Commission.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR—FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 9007, making appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, and related independent agencies, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9007, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed the following conferees: Mr. TARVER, Mr. HOUSTON, Mr. SHEPPARD, Mr. HARE, Mr. ENGEL, and Mr. KEEFE.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to make a brief statement. Yesterday afternoon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOLAND], at my instance, in answer to a query, announced that the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill would be taken up for consideration today. As I say, he did so at my suggestion. Yesterday afternoon late, and this morning, members of the Committee on Appropriations came to me and said they were having the final hearings today on the W. P. A. bill, the so-called relief bill, and asked that they be not called upon to come into the House today to consider the agricultural appropriation bill. I thought that was a reasonable request, and after they had talked with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOLAND] and myself, we agreed not to call that bill up until tomorrow, and to go on today with the amendments to the wage-hour bill. I make that statement in fairness to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOLAND].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, if the wage hour bill amendments are not finished today, will that bill be in order tomorrow, or will we consider the agricultural appropriation bill conference report instead?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would rather answer that later in the day.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that upon the conclusion of the legislative business today and of the other special orders I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article entitled "Let's Build More Houses," and also a letter from Mr. Stewart McDonald, Administrator of the Federal Housing Administration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include excerpts from the magazine Action and from a series of lectures on the German-British conflict.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. I reserve the right to object. What is it on?

Mr. THORKELSON. On the World Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include an editorial that appeared in the Catholic Telegraph Register.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL BLITZKRIEG AGAINST CALIFORNIA

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I am bringing some late news of the Federal blitzkrieg against California. I want to read from a Los Angeles Times article:

Secretary Ickes said today that if Congress would appropriate enough money to maintain the national parks he gladly would permit movie companies to use public lands without cost, etc.

He has also entered into a controversy with another official, and I shall put that into the RECORD later.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and I beg that my colleagues will read these remarks and give to me the same help they would like me to give to them under similar conditions.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE W. P. A.

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, we have just been advised that the Committee on Appropriations are now in the closing days of their hearings on the W. P. A. appropriation. I have just returned from an investigation that was conducted in Tuscarawas County of my congressional district relative to the W. P. A. and I therefore wish the Members of the House to know of some of the evidence that was offered during these hearings.

Evidence was produced at this investigation that showed that men had to ride from 15 to 18 miles from their homes to work on W. P. A. projects while there were projects of W. P. A. going on within a short distance of their own home.

Evidence was also produced where men and women were dismissed from W. P. A. because they belonged to certain organizations.

In another instance, 1 gentleman with 10 children could not be reassigned to W. P. A. because he was receiving help to the amount of $5 per month from one of his children.

In another instance, one man received a W. P. A. check for 37 cents and this constituted a pay day and prevented him from further work for 2 weeks.

There seems to be a general lack of cooperation and of administering fair play where the need of a particular family was very much in evidence.

In another instance, approximately 50 or 60 men appeared for work on a project one morning, but found that the tools and implements to do the work were not on the job and they were ordered to return home. There was also a general condition existing where men with large families were not given preference as compared to those who were married but had no children, and veterans were not given the veterans' preference in line with the veterans' preference of the W. P. A. legislation.

As a matter of fact, the largest and most serious handicap is the differential in wage rates between the counties of my congressional district, especially when the dividing line happens to be the main artery of small villages and the differential in the wage scale from the lowest class of unskilled or class B is approximately $8 on the monthly rate. In other words, one county for unskilled or class B labor is $50, whereas the other county affected in unskilled or class B is $42.90, and the lowest bracket in my district for class B unskilled is $39. I am convinced the general classification of these wage rates is entirely unfair and not based on the general average as paid in private industry and that a readjustment should be made at this session of Congress, as I am positive it costs just as much to live in one county of my congressional district as it does in the other. A loaf of bread costs just as much and clothing and other commodities are the same price. The only difference probably would be in the monthly house rent.

It was also shown at this investigation that the provision of after 18 months of continuous work on the W. P. A. that the forced 30-day lay-off has worked an extreme hardship, and not in one single case was their any evidence produced that any person was reassigned after having worked 18 months continuous and being off 30 days, was he or she immediately reassigned back to work, but in most instances, they had to wait from 3 to 4 months for reassignment, and I am convinced that this provision of the act has worked an extreme hardship on these people, who through no fault of their own have been forced to work on W. P. A. for a livelihood. I am glad I opposed that provision during the last session of Congress and I shall again oppose it when it comes before Congress at this session.

I regret very much that Congress has not seen fit to reappropriate for the P. W. A., which to me was the most constructive piece of legislation that we have ever passed because, first of all, it fixed responsibility and permitted contracts to be made with private contractors who in turn hired union labor and the various men in the building trades were placed at their particular profession and a good construction project was the result. I therefore hope in the coming W. P. A. appropriation bill that no construction work will be done by W. P. A., but will all be contained in a new P. W. A. bill. We must, however, with so many million men still being unemployed, provide for work relief for these needy men and women and we should bear in mind the experiences of this past year and the many hardships these people have faced, when we pass the bill in the next few weeks.

I therefore hope the wage scale will be revised and placed on a more equal basis throughout the Northern States as I believe the only division of comparison where people can live cheaper is in the Southern States and not the industrial States of the North. I therefore hope every Member of the House will study very thoroughly his own congressional district and the conditions therein and will be prepared in the coming weeks during the discussion and debate on this W. P. A. appropriation, so that when we appropriate the necessary funds, we will not have the continued hardship that we have experienced during these past many months. [Applause.]

NEGRO CONGRESS

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, last week end a group of Negroes held what was known as the National Negro Congress in the District of Columbia. This Congress, as the Youth Congress which preceded it, does not represent the colored people in this country who are trying to live according to democratic and Christian standards. Rather, it was inspired by Communists, white as well as colored, who are trying to ally American Negroes with Moscow in an attempt to overthrow this Government.

I read with amazement and despair that a declaration was passed and applauded by the Negro Congress wherein it was stated that if the United States ever went to war with Soviet Russia they would refuse to defend this country. That is treason. That statement should be repudiated by all Negroes who love this country and who believe in democracy. No intolerant white man could have hurt our American Negroes as much as those deluded members of their own race. The greatest enemies of our colored minority in the United States are those who pass such vicious resolutions as that which I have just read. [Applause.]

No group in America is doing more to undermine the rights of our Negro population than the leaders of the Negro Congress, who are obviously in the pay of the Communist Party in America. [Applause.]

John L. Lewis is equally culpable with the author of that treasonable resolution passed by the Negro Congress. He openly invited the Negro Congress to join his Labor Non-Partisan League, which is the political arm of the C. I. O. Inferentially he approves the composition and program of any group which he invites to affiliate with the C. I. O. There can be no doubt in the mind of anyone that in this instance Mr. Lewis has encouraged the spread of communism.

Much credit must be given to A. Phillip Randolph, of New York, head of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, who declined reelection for a third term as president and then resigned from the Congress because it had been financed by the Communist Party.

White people, as well as Negroes, should join in open condemnation of the Negro Communist Congress, its sponsors, and its treasonable declaration which I referred to in my opening remarks.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include two short newspaper articles.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include an article by Herbert Hoover on Russian misadventure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include excerpts from certain letters I have received.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a short quotation from a letter of the Director of the A. A. A.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a letter and reply thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Hon. Arthur H. James, Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, who spoke in a radio address before the Indiana Republican Editorial Association in the Claypool Hotel, Indianapolis, Ind., Friday evening, April 26, 1940.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

LOBBYING

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and for permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know whether the process of formulating legislation, as provided for under the rules laid down by the House of Representatives, has broken down completely. As everyone around the Capitol knows, Nathan Straus, Administrator for the United States Housing Authority, and members of his staff have in the last few weeks been gumshoeing about the Capitol and offices of Congressmen lobbying for the passage of the housing bill that was defeated last year. This is bad enough, and if I had my way these men would be in jail for doing this.

Every bureaucrat should be put in jail for lobbying to put his schemes through Congress.

But Mr. Straus and his crowd are not engaged in just ordinary lobbying. Apparently afraid to face the Banking and Currency Committee, which rightfully is charged with considering legislation pertaining to the United States Housing Authority, Mr. Straus and his crowd have been holding star-chamber meetings in some of the private offices of Congressmen with members of the Banking and Currency Committee to weasel his pet legislation through. The remarkable thing about these meetings is that some of the members of the Banking and Currency Committee have been invited and others not.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. No, I do not yield; not now.

In my opinion this is not proper parliamentary procedure.

As for this perfidious action by Mr. Straus and members of his staff, these people should be promptly set back into their seats with enough force so they will stay put permanently. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein an address by Senator W. C. Cordell at the Democratic National Convention at Bristol, Va.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein a very fine editorial by Dr. Chester D. Swope.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a statement given before the Flood Committee of the House by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

LOBBYING

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from Ohio, who preceded me, stated that the Rules Committee has broken down. Were it not for the fact that the Rules Committee met today and in response to the requests of many members for hearings on their bills and resolutions, I would not rise to contradict the statement of the gentleman from Ohio and to inform them that the committee acted and granted five special rules on their bills and resolutions. The California and New York delegations will be interested to know that we granted rules on the two Senate joint resolutions on which they had requested action.

The gentleman from Ohio also stated that gentlemen from the United States Housing Authority have had private conferences at the Capitol. I wish to say that I have no knowledge of any conferences and do not know where the gentleman obtained his information, but his innuendo would indicate that a conference was held with me. In this he is in error. I have had no conferences, but I will say that I have requested various heads of departments from time to time to explain their position on resolutions referred to my committee. Personally, I feel that the bill to amend the National Housing Act should be considered, as no legislation has brought about greater benefits to business and to bring about reemployment than this act.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I yield to my colleague from Georgia.

Mr. COX. I do not hold any special brief for Mr. Straus, but I think it only fair to him to say that he has not been on the Hill except upon the invitation of a Member of this Congress. I have talked with Mr. Straus myself, and he came upon my invitation. I know he was here upon another occasion and that then he came on the invitation of a Congressman. It is only fair to Mr. Straus that this be said, and I am glad to say it.

Mr. SABATH. I am pleased at this time that I can agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] that Mr. Straus is an exceptionally sincere and able man, endeavoring to be of real service to the country.

THE AMERICAN NEGRO

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I did not hear the full statement made by my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALLEN]. I am quite sure, however, that he did not want to convey to the Congress that there is any question of the loyalty of the American Negro. There are very few Negroes in any way affiliated with the Communist Party. Communists have done everything in their power to exploit the injustices or inequalities that may exist among the colored people of America. The Communists were very hopeful that they could go a long way by exploiting these injustices and thus turn the American Negroes into Communists; but I want to go on record as saying that 99½ percent of the American Negroes are loyal American citizens. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a split second?

Mr. COLMER. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. In answer to the statement made by the gentleman from New York, I want to say that I prefaced my remarks by stating that the Negro Congress, in my opinion, did not represent the Negroes of this country.

Mr. COLMER. I was pleased to hear the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania condemning the National Negro Congress, now in session here in Washington. But I am afraid that back of all of this there is something more than the question of the loyalty of the Negro. There are some very prominent white people in national affairs who, I fear, are responsible for stirring up this turmoil among the Negroes. [Applause.] This Negro Congress is nothing more nor less than a communistic affair. And certain organizations who characterize themselves as patriotic American institutions are inviting these communistic Negroes to join them. And I refer to John L. Lewis specifically.

As one who comes from the South, where we have a large Negro population, I desire to here and now warn these self-styled leaders to stay out of the South with that kind of inciting propaganda. The white people of States like Mississippi will not tolerate this communistic aggravation of the southern Negroes. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I ask to have printed therein an article by Charles P. Ross entitled "Opportunity Knocks for Republicans."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Obviously a quorum is not present.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 90]

Burgin	Green	Merritt	Schulte
Byrne, N. Y.	Hill	Mitchell	Shafer, Mich.
Byron	Izac	Mundt	Starnes, Ala.
Chapman	Jarman	Nelson	Taylor
Culkin	Jarrett	Patrick	Voorhis, Calif.
Darrow	Jennings	Patton	Ward
Englebright	McLaughlin	Reece, Tenn.	Weaver
Folger	Maas	Rogers, Okla.	Whelchel
Gilchrist	Martin, Ill.	Routzohn	White, Ohio

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three hundred and ninety-four Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

On motion of Mrs. NORTON, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address by the Panamanian Ambassador before the Panama Canal Society, in Washington, on April 20.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address by the gentleman from California [Mr. KRAMER], on April 6, 1940.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOYKIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. TENEROWICZ asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on 11 Senate amendments in the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on two subjects.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT]?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial from the Mount Vernon (Ohio) News.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McGREGOR]?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS]?

There was no objection.

Mrs. CLARA G. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered by J. Edgar Hoover.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from South Carolina [Mrs. CLARA G. McMILLAN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein two court opinions, one by Hon. George A. Welch, of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, and the second by the Honorable F. Dickinson Letts, United States district judge, District of Columbia, with regard to the activities of the Dies committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO]?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENTS TO THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT OF 1938

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5435) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5435, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that when the House adjourned yesterday the Chair was about to recognize the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I will offer my amendment to section 5.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further amendments to section 3?

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REED of New York: On page 5, line 3, strike out line 3 and all up to and including the period in line 9 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "products consisting wholly or in chief volume of perishable or seasonal fruits or vegetables, including dried fruits, or in handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations, the provisions of subsection (a), during a period or periods of not more than 16 workweeks in the aggregate in any calendar year, shall not apply to his employees in any place of employment where he is engaged."

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I believe you will all recall that when this original legislation was passed we put in a clause relating to the area of production. We provided that the Administrator should determine the area of production. I have some sympathy with the Administrator. I believe we made it very difficult for him. He probably did the very best he could, but he fixed that area of production as a radius of 10 miles from the farm to the processing plant.

I am sure if the Administrator or the Members of Congress that passed that law could have taken a little airplane trip over my district and observed the processing plants distributed along that fruit-growing and vegetable-growing area they would have realized that the so-called area of production was not a very practicable proposition. I happen to know that my farmers out there, who raise a great variety of fruits—strawberries, raspberries, currants, peaches, pears, grapes, gooseberries, and various other fruits—do not care to be put in an iron cage and have a leash put around their necks and told that they cannot take advantage of the market the various processors offer them. I know in my own case, say, with regard to tomatoes, that it may be to my advantage to go 15 miles, even 20 miles to a certain processing plant whose contracts are better and which pays more promptly, or for other reasons. So when you put a leash on a farmer and say, "Here, you must go to a processing plant within 10 miles," it works a very great injustice to him.

All of these various fruits and vegetables which I have outlined mature and are ready for market at various times in the season. It is not uncommon to see 50 to 75 loaded wagons of tomatoes, for instance, waiting their turn, and waiting until long into the night. It is utterly impossible for the processing plants to take care of these products as they rush in from the fields.

What I should like to see is the passing of this Barden amendment so that the 10-mile limit will be eliminated, in order that my people can take advantage of the market. There is no reason for giving a processor a monopoly of all the produce within the radius of 10 miles. In that situation he can fix his own price with impunity.

Further, it is not fair to these canning industries, or to the farmers, or to the employees, to confine them to 14 weeks. These products do not all mature at the same time. They are not ready for processing at the same time. Sometimes there is a mixture, such as fruit salads, which require that large quantities of the fruits entering into the processing of salads are placed in storage, using the modern processes of refrigeration to preserve them until needed, and then later on their processing will give employment for a period of weeks. We are asking only for 16 weeks. They will give employment for a period of weeks. Otherwise these small processing plants—and most of them are comparatively small—find that because of the increased cost and risk of losing the exemptions they have to shut down.

My amendment simply provides that where the chief volume of perishable products is concerned they may get the benefit of these 16 weeks. It means much to the employees, and it means a great deal to the farmers. I believe this is a reasonable amendment.

I am not quarreling about the minimum wage, but in these processing plants it is utterly impossible, unless you know the business of the farmer, to regulate these things, and no administrator down here can do it. These conditions work tremendous harm to the employers, to the farmers, and to the processors. I am not speaking for the big processors in Chicago and Pittsburgh, and others of that class, I am speaking of the small markets for the farmers in my section of the country.

I believe this is a reasonable amendment, simply extending the time to 16 workweeks to give them a chance to process over a period of time and take care of all these fruits and vegetables that come into production at different times. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] if the situation complained of by the gentleman is not taken care of on page 5 in the language that the gentleman proposes to strike out?

Mr. REED of New York. No; it is not, and I will explain to the gentleman what I desire to accomplish.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the principal difference here seems to be the language used by the gentleman, "wholly or in chief part." I think the language as it is in the amendment now being considered would approximately take care of the situation.

If the vegetable is put in cold storage, it is still a perishable fruit or vegetable and it is still a seasonal fruit, and if it has to be dried, then it can be mixed in with the others; but this exemption provides for the 16-week exemption with respect to the hours' provision for the reason that the gentleman discussed, and that is to take care of the peak season, when a strawberry or a vegetable is not going to wait for the calendar. It is going to spoil if you do not use it, within a certain time, or preserve it.

Mr. REED of New York. I will say to the gentleman, if he will yield, it is not my purpose in any way to interfere. I am going to support the gentleman's amendment; but I do think, after the experience we have had, that my amendment is most reasonable. I have given very careful study to it, and I simply want to be sure that I have full opportunity to carry out the purpose which I have in mind.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman from New York that I see no chance in the world for the Administrator to misinterpret this language. A vegetable on cold storage is just as perishable as before it was put on cold storage.

Mr. REED of New York. We thought that, too, about the area of production, and we have seen what happened.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Area of production is different.

Mr. REED of New York. Let us play safe and give this benefit to the farmer. Let us give him the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I think the amendment as now written will take care of the gentleman's situation even better than the amendment he has offered, and I hope the committee will stand by the amendment as written in the bill.

Mr. REED of New York. I would like to see the amendment passed. I think it is going to save us a great deal of trouble in the future if my amendment is adopted. I prefer to have the Congress enact the law and make it specific rather than pass it on to others.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I may say to the gentleman that this issue was discussed at the time we prepared the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further amendments to section 3? If not, we will pass on to section 4. Are there any amendments to be offered to section 4?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in section 4.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one of the Members of the House who proposes to get all "hot and bothered" about these proposed amendments to the Wage and Hour Act. I voted against the enactment of the Wage and Hour Act because I believed that the wage provisions of the act would probably not achieve the results that at least some of their proponents hoped for. I was in favor of legislation affecting the subject of hours. But although I opposed the enactment of the act, I do not favor its repeal by indirection. I believe that an opportunity should be accorded those administering the Wage and Hour Act to show that it can be made to work for the benefit of industry and of labor in this country. I am personally doubtful as to the effectiveness of their efforts, but so far as I am concerned, I do not intend to vote for discriminations in favor of one industry as against another where there is not some logical reason for the adoption of an exception. I do not believe in making fish of one and fowl of another.

At the last session of the Congress I voted to take up in this House the provisions of the Norton bill or the committee bill, under suspension of the rules, and I think it would have been far better for those who are interested in trying to obtain some undoubtedly needed amendments to the existing law if that bill had been considered and had been passed by the Congress. I think it is better to get something of a character recognized as needed by practically everybody rather than to attempt to get a great deal in the way of drastic amendments and get nothing, and I think that is the situation with which you are confronted here today. If you proceed to the adoption of drastic amendments to the Wage and Hour Act, the result is going to be that the Senate will not consider them, and if they are considered and passed by the Senate, they will not be signed by the President.

There are certain amendments included in the Norton bill or the committee bill which will be vastly beneficial to a great many thousands of workers in this country, and I can conceive of no reason why we should refuse to agree to those amendments and enact them into law just because there may be a large percentage of us who favor the enactment of additional amendments. Half a loaf is better than no bread. And when I speak of bread, I wish to point out that the means of livelihood of scores of thousands of workers would be vastly improved by the committee amendments. In time there will be other amendments. The people of the United States will not permit indefinitely to remain on the statute books any law or any part of a law if it shall have been thoroughly demonstrated to be unfair or unjust either to industry or labor. We have this law; let us give it a fair trial. It is a practical proposition, and I say to you that the membership of the House who really want to accomplish something in the way of effective amendments to the Wage and Hour Act at this session of Congress would, in my judgment, be wise to abandon their efforts to very drastically amend the existing law and adopt the modifications which have been recommended by the committee and which have some chance of passing.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. Gladly.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman regard the Barden amendments to be drastic?

Mr. TARVER. In some respects I do.

Mr. COX. In what respects?

Mr. TARVER. Discussing the details of the Barden bill is impossible for me to undertake in the 5 minutes allowed me. I will say that if the House passes the Barden amendments and the Senate should concur with the action of the House, the net result in my judgment would be that no legislation would be enacted at this session, because I feel sure, and I think the gentleman feels sure, that legislation going as far as the Barden amendments would be vetoed by the President. I am anxious to get something done in the outstanding cases where amendments to this act are generally recognized as necessary, and we cannot get it done if we insist on all we want in the way of amendments.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman not think we should meet our responsibility as we understand it, and do what we think is right?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I take these few minutes to clarify my position, and a difficult position it is. Originally I was for the wage-hour law, long before many of my Republican colleagues were willing to vote for it. I think it is generally understood why I was for the wage-hour law. However, if you will look over the remarks I made at the time, I think you will find that I declared that reforms should come very slowly, that as we found that injustices had been committed we should be willing to amend the act. But all these New Deal measures that we have passed meet great resistance whenever attempts are made to reconsider and amend. I have had much experience as a farmer. I know that anything added to the expense of processing is generally taken out of the farmer; it is not handed on to the consumer. Processors have to compete for the consumer's trade. It is a paradox that a government should enforce extraordinary expenses on the processor and then under trade agreements enforce more competition. Of course, the farmer has to bear this processing expense, and we can well understand his situation.

First we have the Norton amendments. I had rather expected that they would be sufficient to meet my approval, but when I hear that the Norton amendments are not to be supported by the committee itself, I do not know where I would be left if I did not vote for the Barden amendments. I want to help relieve the present conditions so plainly shown to be needed. Both bills seem to remedy the imposition of the act on those already receiving high wages. Many of us realize that the banks are now closing at 2 o'clock instead of 3 because of the act, although we did not attempt to cover in such well-paid employees. I said at the time that I voted for the Wage and Hour Act that I feared that many of those rural communities that performed so-called piece work might be adversely affected. It reminded me of the many Cape Cod widowed families of my boyhood days. They were glad enough to have a little work at home if they could earn even very small wages. Well do I remember those great packages of tags, where they put in a little red string and tied it—at very small pay, but it was so much better than nothing. I dreaded lest that rural home work should be wholly taken away, because of this wage-hour bill. My own section, I trust, has outgrown the need of it. So I refer back to you that although I was willing and wanted to bring about a Wage and Hour Act, in relation to large industries and protect ourselves from our own miserable competition in many ways, yet I was not so foolish as not to know that the time would surely come when we ought to try to amend the act, and unless I can see real support for the Norton bill I am going the full way for the Barden amendments. I repeat again, whatever you put onto the cannery you put onto the farmer. I well understand what it means to have goods sent to market and then have word sent back asking for the expense of shipment. The farmer was wholly at their mercy. Nowadays in my section, and I think also in yours, the farmers have usually formed their own cooperatives for processing. We also use the refrigeration availabilities, and our farmers want to be able to take from the freezer any time of the year and put the goods on the market. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLAND: On page 8, line 21, strike out all of subsection (f) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(f) Canning, processing, or preserving of any product consisting wholly or in chief volume of perishable or seasonal fruits or vegetables, including dried fruits, or in handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations to the extent any employer in either case is so engaged."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to clarify the evident intent in section (f).

When the conference report on the wage and hour bill was before the House I supported it. I voted for it because I believed that the small-canning people, who were giving me great concern, had been taken care of in the language "area of production." But I find the interpretations to be such that they have not.

I want to call attention to the fact that in the Barden amendment that has been offered to section (f) it prohibits any person from receiving the benefit who does anything else except can, preserve, and so forth, perishable or seasonal fruits or vegetables. If, perchance, in order to carry on a small factory for a short time, pork and beans are canned or taken care of, or some soups, some things that are not seasonal or perishable, if one article is taken care of in that factory, then the cannery does not get the benefit that is intended by section (f).

I am simply asking that the party who is engaged in canning, processing, or preserving of any product consisting wholly or in chief volume of perishable or seasonal fruits or vegetables, including dried fruits, or in handling or transportation with or incidental to such operations, to the extent any employer in either case is so engaged, may still receive the benefits under this paragraph.

In other words, instead of putting an inhibition against the whole factory if one can of pork and beans is canned, I say "to the extent that he is canning perishable or seasonal commodities" he shall be entitled to the benefits that are intended here. It is the unintentional language in the amendment, I think, which defeats the amendment.

Now, it is said that this is trying "to chisel." There are as many small canneries in my district as probably any district in the United States. If the farmer cannot send his goods to that cannery, he would be dealing with them at a loss, and he does get something by dealing with the cannery. Unskilled labor, seasonal labor, labor that works partly on the farm and partly in the cannery, labor that cannot compare with the canneries in the large industrial centers, labor that is entitled to a little pittance to help out is glad to come there and cooperate with the farmer in making a living.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL] put his finger on it yesterday when he said it is not between labor and capital, but this is between labor and labor, because the farmer is a laborer himself. [Applause.]

I am just asking that he shall have an opportunity not only to raise his crops, not only to meet competition, but be given an opportunity to provide work for these people in the factory. I am pleading for the laborers in my district, in my section, in asking for this reasonable amendment.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE], who represents an agricultural district, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BUCKLER], who also represents an agricultural district, exploded the theory that the Barden bill was proposed in the interest of and for the benefit of the farmer. These two men, with a sincerity that has characterized their every action since they have been Members of the Congress, stated that they could not subscribe to the philosophy that the farmer is benefited by decreasing the wage of the masses of American workers. Mr. Chairman, a million and a half American workers will be affected by the Barden bill.

I do not believe there is any answer to the arguments advanced by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BUCKLER] against the passage of the Barden bill. I think they have hit at the very nub of this whole question when they stated that in their sound judgment—and they represent farmers—that the plight of the farmer cannot possibly be relieved by attempting, through the methods contained in this bill, to lower the purchasing power of so many million American workers.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEALEY. Not just now.

I want to take occasion, before the debate will have concluded on this very important measure, to pay a tribute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK], a member of the Labor Committee.

I believe he represents the enlightened and progressive leadership of his section of the country. As a Member of this Congress he has displayed on all occasions sincerity and outstanding ability on whatever assignment the Congress has seen fit to place him. As chairman of the Civil Service Committee he reported a very difficult and complex bill to the House, and the manner in which he handled that bill called forth the admiration of all Members. [Applause.] As a member of the Committee on Labor he has given thoughtful and profound consideration to all of these very complex measures affecting the workers of our Nation. In his speech of yesterday he stated that the philosophy of the Barden bill was not helpful to the great section of the country that he represented. He does not believe that the industrial future of the South depends upon low wages and long hours. In his opinion, the South will be helped by stimulating purchasing power. By paying fair wages, the wage earners of the South will be enabled to buy the products of southern industry and industrial workers there will be encouraged to greater productivity if they were paid a fair and decent wage.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEALEY. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the gentleman's remarks. Would the gentleman be kind enough to tell the House whether or not he favors the Norton bill?

Mr. HEALEY. I do not favor many of the provisions of the Norton bill.

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman does not intend even to support the bill presented by the committee of which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] is a member.

Mr. HEALEY. I cannot support it in toto because I believe it exempts from the provisions of the Wage and Hour Act many persons who require its protection, and these exemptions are not warranted by the facts.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it always has been my conviction that in a country as vast and diversified as the United States of America, where the cost of living and production varies so greatly, the attempt to force all the members of any single industry to comply with a universal or uniform standard is sheer idiocy and impossible of accomplishment. Notwithstanding that fact, I think there are good arguments both for and against the wage-hour bill, although I opposed it in its original form because I felt that it was exceedingly difficult, if not utterly impossible, for any agency justly and equitably to enforce a law of its kind.

My purpose in rising at this moment is to read to the Members of the House a letter I received recently from one of the most prominent and intelligent members of the Ozark Canners' Association, and I would like to ask the indulgence of the Committee and crave the attention of the ladies and gentlemen present to what this canner himself has to say:

CHAMBERLAIN CANNING CO.,
Anderson, Mo., April 13, 1940.

The Honorable DEWEY SHORT,
Representative from Missouri, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SHORT: At a committee meeting of some of the Ozark canners at Fayetteville last Wednesday it was stated that there is some possibility of the "area of production" being adjusted to a 75-mile radius rather than the 10-mile radius under which we are operating now.

The same arguments that we used against the 10-mile radius last year apply to this prospective ruling. It is unfair. We would much rather all canners were required to pay the wage minimum, which we do not protest, than to have some few canners of the Ozarks have to pay a higher wage than is required of the others, but at the same time have to sell their product on a competitive basis with these other canners.

In this district many growers expect to sell their fresh vegetables and fruits on the fresh market. The fresh market is not always stable, and when the growers cannot get a satisfactory price there they offer their product to the canner. If there is no "area of production" restriction, the canner may bid for these fruits and vegetables. If there is the restriction, the canner cannot handle them, and the grower, who is already out his harvesting and transportation expenses, has a total loss on his hands; besides the waste of good vegetables which must be dumped.

To one who is familiar with the fruit and vegetable business in this or any district, it is evident that this "area of production" ruling works a severe hardship upon the farmer—the very man who needs every fair advantage and opportunity possible.

We also protest the unfairness of a canner in a town of 2,500 population having to pay the minimum wage while a canner within 2 or 3 miles of the city limits may pay any price he pleases. This situation occurs in several instances. Both canners draw from the same producing territory and sell to the same consuming territory.

Frankly, we personally would be glad to see all canners compelled to pay the wage minimum. We do not feel that, on the whole, canners have paid their labor enough. Housewives would be willing to pay a few cents on the dozen more, and if all canners had to pay their labor a little more we could obtain sufficient increase on the canned goods to pay the higher cost of production. As it stands, only a few canners have the higher cost of production, and they can obtain no more for their canned goods than do their neighbors who have the lower cost of production.

We believe further that canners of perishable products should be released from the restricted-hours portion of the law because, like Nature herself, crops continue to grow, regardless of law, and they must be handled as they are ready or the loss will be heavy and the cost needlessly advanced. It is all right for the restricted-hours portion to be applied out of canning season, but during canning season at the peak of the harvest load we may need our crew 60 hours during 1 week. There might only 1 such week occur during the season, and it would be impractical to try to obtain extra help for that short period—impractical and in some instances impossible.

If your views coincide with ours—and we believe we are looking at it fairly for the industry as a whole—we will appreciate your doing all you can to bring about a fair and equal ruling applicable to all canners. We understand the hearing on this will be this week.

With kindest regards, I am,
Yours very truly,

S. G. CHAMBERLAIN.

I am very happy that such a reasonable and sound letter comes from a constituent of mine. For the benefit of the Members of the House, let me say that after contacting the Wage and Hour Division of the Labor Department I have been informed that these prospective hearings will be held as follows:

On the 1st of May hearings on packing of citrus fruits in the area of production. On May 6 hearings on the packing of noncitrus fruits and vegetables in the area of production. On May 9 hearings on the canning of all fruits and vegetables in the area of production. You gentlemen whose districts are vitally affected by this legislation I am sure will want to attend these hearings and register the interest of your constituencies before this particular Division administering the wage-hour law.

Mr. WOOD and Mr. RAMSPECK rose.

Mr. SHORT. I shall have to yield first to my colleague from Missouri.

Mr. WOOD. Does not the gentleman believe that the committee bill covers all the objections made in the letter he just read?

Mr. SHORT. No.

Mr. WOOD. The committee bill raises the exemption to 60 hours a week on perishable products.

Mr. SHORT. It takes care of some of the problems, it is true, but not all.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I would like to add what the writer of that letter said, because really the Barden amendments discriminate between employers engaged in the same industry. The canner of fresh fruits and vegetables gets an exemption, whereas the canner of fresh fruits and vegetables, and also dry lines, such as pork, beans, soups, and so forth, does not get any exemption.

Mr. SHORT. That shows, of course, the complicated nature of the problem and the complicated state of the law itself. It only goes to show that the wage-hour law should never have been enacted in the first place, but since it is now the law, we should enact certain amendments which would give relief to the greatest number in small industries that are threatened with total destruction. Because of the complex nature of the problem, I do not think it is possible for any Federal agency under any administration, regardless of its political color, to administer such a complicated law with justice to all members of any given industry.

Already several amendments have been adopted which have added only confusion to our present difficulties, and no doubt other amendments will be adopted that will further complicate our problem. Perhaps the Congress should blame itself for enacting such a measure rather than blame any poor individual who is bold enough to attempt the administration of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we cannot reach an agreement as to time. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. ELLIS. I object.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be arbitrary, but this bill is going to take considerable time unless we can get some agreement. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I was on the floor seeking time to be heard on the amendment which has just been acted on, and I was denied the privilege of being heard. I am going to object to all limitations of time hereafter.

Mrs. NORTON. I am sorry the gentleman could not be heard. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on section 5 and all amendments thereto close in 35 minutes.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentle lady yield?

Mrs. NORTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Has the gentlewoman covered all of those who wish to discuss this section?

Mrs. NORTON. I think the Chairman can divide the time to take care of every Member who rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN) there were—ayes 74, noes 83.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GWYNNE to the Barden substitute: On page 7, after the word "effects", in line 4, insert the following new paragraph:

"Section 13 (a) of such act is further amended by striking out clause (8) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"'(8) any employee employed in connection with the publication of any newspaper with a circulation of less than 5,000; or'."

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is a very simple one. It will be remembered that in the present wage and hour law, weekly and semiweekly newspapers having a circulation of less than 3,000 are exempt. The purpose of my amendment is to extend this exemption to all newspapers having a circulation of less than 5,000. If we adopt the amendment, we will be carrying out what I believe was really the intention of the House when we passed the original Wage and Hour Act. We had in mind at that time inserting language in this bill which would exempt from its provisions country newspapers as we know them. Unfortunately, however, we did not pick the figure that carries out our thought and intention. In my State, for example, and in a great many other States undoubtedly, most of the small papers are now exempt. We have in Iowa, however, 50 papers with a circulation of between three and five thousand. They are published under substantially the same conditions as the papers that are now exempt. Furthermore, it should be borne in mind these papers are published in small towns where sweatshop conditions do not prevail. They are paid in practically every instance, and this is true in my State particularly, not only above the minimum but above the maximum. There is no reservoir of skilled labor in these small towns who can get out these papers in time of peak loads. It is rather stretching the imagination to say that the publishing of a country newspaper is interstate commerce. We had a survey made in my State, and we found that only 4 percent of the circulation of the small papers in Iowa went outside the State and 8 percent of the revenue was received from outside the State.

Mr. CARLSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GWYNNE. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CARLSON. The fact is the present law provides for an exemption of weeklies and semiweekly newspapers from the provisions of the Wage and Hour Act up to 3,000 subscribers. I am hoping your amendment will be adopted. When they do job printing, as well as publishing, they come under the Wage and Hour Act, and this works a real hardship. Here is an opportunity for Congress to remedy this situation.

Mr. GWYNNE. That is correct. My amendment would remedy this situation.

Mr. TALLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GWYNNE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TALLE. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GWYNNE] deserves a lot of credit for presenting this amendment. It is constructive. It will make the law more suitable to the conditions which prevail in the weekly newspaper business. In my district there are a great many country weeklies which would be well served by this amendment. I cannot believe that the present law was intended at the outset to apply to these little newspapers. I want to assure the gentleman of my support.

Mr. GWYNNE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GWYNNE. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The original exemption, it seems to me, was based on the argument it was difficult in these small towns to get substitute help.

Mr. GWYNNE. That is right.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That same condition certainly exists for small dailies as for the weeklies which are published in the same-sized town or have a small circulation.

Mr. GWYNNE. That is true.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GWYNNE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Carrying the thought of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] a little further, all newspaper work is more or less seasonal. You will have a heavy run of advertising in the spring and again before harvest, then right before Christmas. There are lulls in between. The labor used on a newspaper is highly skilled. You cannot lay them off in slack times and put them on in rush times; so the newspapers have to carry them over the entire 12 months.

Mr. GWYNNE. That is true.

It has been argued by many lawyers that if we had not written any exemptions in the law at all, the newspapers might have been exempt. Under the law we exempted retail service establishments where the major portion of their business is intrastate. In my State we have a sales tax, and under the sales-tax law it becomes necessary to decide what is and what is not a service establishment. It has been held in Iowa that a newspaper is a service establishment. Therefore they all might have been exempt if we had not put this 3,000 limitation in the original law.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GWYNNE. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. I am heartily in favor of the gentleman's amendment. I know the gentleman is a good lawyer and I would like to ask him this question: If we continue to add exemptions to the present law, it will soon be a bill of exemptions.

Mr. GWYNNE. We are not adding an exemption here. We are just fixing one up.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. As a matter of fact, the gentleman's amendment would simply clarify a section that is now subject to a great deal of problematical interpretation.

Mr. GWYNNE. That is correct.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks that may be regarded as akin to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER]. Many Members of this body are unquestionably very serious in their work of trying to make a workable law out of the wage-hour law. This action is justified as a result of a report filed in this Congress by Mr. Andrews, the ex-Administrator of the wage and hour law, who was, as is the present Administrator, required by law to report to this body. I wish to read you an excerpt from the report by Mr. Andrews, the Administrator, a report filed by him as required by the law. This has to do with the area of production:

> This procedure of investigation and redefinition for individual industries will not produce satisfactory results. In each instance it is clear that no amount of care or study can result in a definition of "area of production" which will not create a discriminatory situation.
> The term "area of production" as used in section 7 (c) and section 13 (a) (10) is ambiguous and is subject to a great variety of possible interpretations. The term was used previously in the N. R. A. definition of "agriculture," and was the cause of great administrative difficulties at that time. It has had an even more disturbing history to date under the Fair Labor Standards Act.
> The difficulties of arriving at any approximate definition of what constitutes the "general vicinity" or "rural regions" are apparent. All of these considerations lead to the conclusion that any precise, definite, uniformly applicable, and at the same time equitable and justifiable definition of "area of production" as used in the act cannot be found. Its elimination or clarification of its meaning by the Congress therefore appears necessary.

Mr. Chairman, that is what I have attempted to do, and I regret to have to oppose an amendment that raises the exemption to newspapers having 5,000 circulation. I have lots of such newspapers in my district, and it is not popular for me to oppose this amendment. However, I sincerely hope we will continue our serious and sincere effort to make this a workable bill and not attach amendments to it just because somebody has written to us. I hope this amendment will be defeated. Possibly some of these newspapers may need relief, but this certainly has no bearing on agriculture, and I do not care to fly any false flag. I am not going to be a party to it. I am on a serious mission. A great many Members of this House have encouraged me and have consulted and counseled with me on this bill, and I should like for them to be just as serious now as they were then.

This pending amendment, in my opinion, is not so good. I do not see any good purpose served by it. It may make the editors feel better, but I believe now we had better look to the common good of the situation.

If we should take this bill today, if it were possible to do so, and strike out of section 13 (a) (10) six words, we would make a fairly workable bill out of it; that is, if we should strike out that provision which states "area of production as defined by the Administrator," it would be a pretty good bill, and I wish there were some way to do it. [Applause.]

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Would not the gentleman be more satisfied to leave the definition of "area of production" to a court rather than to an administrative body?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I am sorry the gentleman has mentioned that. Many lawsuits have been started to try to define it, and each one of them has been dismissed by reason of the Administrator's filing a special appearance and denying that the court has jurisdiction over him unless the complainant comes to the District of Columbia to sue him.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I was under the impression the gentleman's bill would correct this evil of the ruling on the area of production.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. The only way we could arrive at a correction without using the definition was to set out the individual operations, and that is what the section we are now considering attempts to do.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Does the gentleman believe his bill corrects this condition?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Certainly I think so. If I did not, I would not be supporting it. But the bill or the purpose it was intended to serve will not be helped if it is loaded with bad amendments.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 45 minutes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make the suggestion that it might facilitate matters if the amendments were read so that before we agree to a limitation we may know what amendments are to be considered. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all pending amendments to section 5 be reported.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I believe that would take too much time, and I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia that debate on section 5 and all amendments thereto close in 45 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the wage and hour law should be considered for the good it will do underpaid workers and the jobs it will create in industry or on the farm. The pending amendment is like practically all the other amendments that are attached to the wage-hour bill—they are for elimination of employees from under the act. There may be certain inequalities that have arisen since the wage-hour law was enacted, and I know there are many injustices that should be corrected in time, giving longer hours of work to certain manufacturing establishments like canning plants and others which are dealing with foodstuffs which may spoil if they are not taken care of in a short time. Time is an element in caring for foodstuffs, and we should permit longer hours to be worked to care for the foodstuffs, thus giving all people cheaper foodstuffs, more foodstuffs, and a happier people without injuring any person. That is what we want to do with the act—help everybody. I think the Congress is justified in changing the law. When this law was enacted they made too many exemptions. They exempted anyone who worked on a farm; they exempted anyone who worked in any establishment that employed less than eight people. There were so many exemptions when the law was enacted that the law applied to too few people. No wonder it would not work. If this law is ever to be successful, it ought to put a floor on the wages of everybody—on all our people the country over—therefore, how can anyone who is receiving less than 25 cents an hour get along in this day and age, and that was the wage that was to be paid at the time the law was enacted. Today the minimum is 30 cents per hour. How can anyone get along on that rate when you have the highly unionized forces of labor that get a dollar, or a dollar and a quarter, or a dollar and a half an hour? Some unionized labor get the high wages, while these poor fellows who get almost nothing can hardly exist, and now they want to take away any floor established so they will fall. That was the great trouble when we enacted this law; it should have included everybody. Why was it not so written? That is what I wanted to know at the time the original bill passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. For just a question.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman knows, certainly, that men working even in country print shops get more than 25 cents an hour. This is not a problem of wages so far as the small newspaper is concerned; it is a problem of hours when the press breaks down or some rush work comes in and extra help is not available, and the paper is working against the dead line for publication.

Mr. RICH. Certainly; go over here to the Government Printing Office and they get from $1.50 to $1.75 an hour. I am not objecting to exempting the small newspapers any more than I am for any poor laboring man.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. This exemption does not apply to large publishing plants but simply to the small newspapers who have to take their business when they can get it. Some days or some weeks they may have a light run, and other times a heavy run.

Mr. RICH. I am not particularly speaking so much against this one amendment as I am against all the amendments. All the amendments tend to take away from the little fellow, and yet this administration has said that they are trying to help the little fellows, but they do not help them. That is the trouble with this New Deal administration. They did not help the little fellow, and that is what I want to do—give all people a minimum wage so they can live.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the distinguished legislator from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. Does not the gentleman believe that when you place such vast, discretionary power in the hands of a single individual, such as the Administrator, you will always have a government by the whims and fancies of a capricious individual rather than fixed law and established principles?

Mr. RICH. The gentleman is absolutely right.

Mr. SHORT. Does the gentleman feel it is possible for us ever to administer equitably a just and fair law?

Mr. RICH. I would say it could not be done under the present administration.

Mr. SHORT. Or under any administration?

Mr. RICH. We might get an administration whose word is good and one that will do what it says it will do, but when you get a man as administrator, or a man in the White House who is nothing but a dictator, how can you expect to have a good administration? [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COOPER). If the Committee will kindly indulge the Chair a moment, there were 11 Members who rose and indicated they desired recognition. The time was fixed at 45 minutes. Without objection the Chair will recognize those listed for 4 minutes each, and those remaining on the list are the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS], the gentlewoman from Illinois [Miss SUMNER], the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HARRINGTON], the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON], the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN], and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. [RAMSPECK].

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. May we not have the amendment now pending voted upon before the subsequent amendments are offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was just about to put the question on the pending amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, in order that each of the Members listed to speak may have 5 minutes, I will withdraw my request for time on this section and make my remarks on the next section.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the committee has adopted the Gwynne amendment, I withdraw my request for recognition on my amendment.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REED of New York: On page 8, line 21, strike out all of line 21, and everything down to and including line 5, on page 9, and insert the following:

"(F) Canning, processing, or preserving of any perishable or seasonal fruit or vegetable (including handling and transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations), but only to the extent that he is engaged in such activities."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The section which the gentleman seeks to strike out, as I recall, was stricken out by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], which I thought was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct in that understanding, and the Chair invites attention to the fact that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia having been adopted, which struck out the language referred to in the amendment of the gentleman from New York, the amendment would not be in order, certainly, in the form presented.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would like to reserve the right to redraft the amendment and offer it later.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of obtaining information from the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN].

I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if his interpretation of the language on page 7, paragraph (A), beginning in line 12 and ending after the word "casein" in line 16, would include buttermilk. Would the gentleman have any objection to inserting an amendment to include buttermilk, or does the gentleman interpret this language to mean that buttermilk is included?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, may I say to the gentleman that no one in this House or anywhere else ever intended that the Administrator should make a distinction in the tastes of milk in interpreting the term "the area of production," but I understand that he did. Therefore, in drawing this amendment, if you will read the wording of it, you will see it reads as follows:

Cooling, freezing, separating, pasteurizing, drying, fermenting, grading, packing, making, or preparing for market, of milk, skim milk, cream, whey, butter, etc.—

And that is all I know that a cow gives.

Mr. ARENDS. I just wanted the gentleman's interpretation of it.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I do not think there is a question about it, and the dairy folks have approved it.

Mr. ARENDS. They have approved of it?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. ARENDS. I thank the gentleman for his opinion on the matter. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] in his amendment evidently accomplished what I desire to accomplish by my amendment, and therefore I withdraw my amendment and yield back my time.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COFFEE of Washington: Page 11, in section 5 (b) R, after the word "operations", in line 3, insert a period and strike out all down to and including line 11.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is designed to clarify section 5, subsection (b) R, of the bill denominated the Barden bill. This amendment is somewhat unique as an amendment, in that it is an amendment that seeks to eliminate an exemption and restore to the coverage of the Wage and Hour Act one of the largest industries of the United States, namely, the lumber industry. Numerous lumber manufacturers have expressed vigorous opposition to the proposal contained in the Barden bill for an exemption of lumber operations, where the employees number 15 or 16 or less. A similar proposal contained in the original Black-Connery bill was discussed by Dr. Wilson Compton, secretary-manager of the National Lumber Manufacturers Association, in the joint hearings on the bill in 1937. At that time it was pointed out that a proposal to exempt employers of 25 or less men would exempt 20 percent of the national lumber production and 86 percent of the sawmills of the United States. A law which permits an employer of 15 men to pay 30 cents an hour, and requires the employer of 16 men to pay 30 cents per hour, is not fair. If statutory standards are to be applied, no competitor should be exempted. Such or similar exemption would, of course, encourage a stampede or decentralization of ownership and operation, especially in logging and sawing. It is difficult for the Administrator to enforce the law in a widely scattered industry like lumber; but to attempt to solve that difficulty by spreading an exemption over the thousands of small enterprises in which the lower average wages already prevail is merely a form of destruction not only of the present lumber industry, especially in the South and the Northeast, but also of the wage and hour standards themselves. Again I assert that Congress ought not to enact any regulatory provision which it is not able and willing to enforce promptly, uniformly, and impartially upon all competitors.

The amendment which I have offered, Mr. Chairman, is supported by the following organizations interested in lumber manufacturing in the United States, and I am appearing here at their request and offer this amendment: The West Coast Lumbermen's Association, the Western Pine Association, the Southern Pine Association, the Southern Hardwood Producers, Inc., the Southern Cyprus Manufacturers Association, the Northeastern Lumber Manufacturers Association, the California Redwood Association, and the Appalachian Hardwood Manufacturers, Inc., and the National Association of Lumber Manufacturers. In other words, the very firms and corporations engaged in the lumber industry themselves ask that the exemption that this bill seeks to give to the lumber industry be wiped out, and that they all be placed under the provisions of the Wage and Hour Act. This amendment is supported by the great labor organizations, the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L., and it is endorsed by all of the great lumber associations in America who seek to have extended to them the provisions of the Wage and Hour Act. The small operators having 15 or less should not be permitted to pay starvation wages when the law requires great corporations with tremendous investment, as well as small ones with only 16 and 17 or more employees, to come under the provisions of the Wage and Hour Act.

In the interest of fair play, Mr. Chairman, I request that this amendment, which will wipe out the exemption accorded to small isolated lumber operators, be adopted in order that the great lumber industry, one of the greatest industries in America, shall not be penalized by subjecting it to the unjust competition provided by those isolated, sequestered lumber operators in some sections of the United States, where wages as low as 10 cents an hour are paid.

STATE OF WASHINGTON

Mr. Chairman, I take advantage of this opportunity to discuss the Barden bill in general with particular reference to my own State of Washington. I want to give a few facts and statistical data which will show irrefutably the deleterious effect which the passage of the Barden amendment would have upon wage and hour conditions in my State.

The State of Washington has a minimum-wage law which requires payment of 37½ cents an hour to women and minors employed in canneries. In fresh fruit and vegetable packing houses, women and minors must be paid 27½ cents an hour, with extra pay for overtime worked beyond 10 hours a day. Most of the other important fruit and vegetable canning and packing States have no such minimum-wage laws.

Washington has one of the highest wage levels in the Nation in the industries to which the Barden bill would give a complete wage exemption, and thus stands to lose most from a competitive standpoint if the Barden bill is passed.

Examples: Washington apples compete with apples grown in other parts of the country. Wages of apple-packing-house workers in Washington averaged more than 36 cents an hour in 1939, while in the Cumberland-Shenandoah apple-growing area (southern Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia) the average wage was less than 22 cents an hour, in Illinois and Michigan 26 cents an hour and in New York 31 cents an hour. More than three-fourths of the Washington workers earned 30 cents or more an hour in 1939 as compared with 13 percent in the Cumberland-Shenandoah area, 25 percent in Illinois and Michigan, and about 69 percent in New York.

In plants packing mixed vegetables, Washington workers earned an average of 44 cents an hour in 1939. The employees of competing plants in Texas averaged about 20 cents. Almost three-fourths of the employees in Washington earned 30 cents or more an hour as compared with only about 3 percent of those in Texas.

In 1938 the average wage of employees in Washington pea canneries was 46 cents an hour. In Maryland the average wage for pea canneries was 26 cents, in New York 30 cents, in Illinois 36 cents, Wisconsin 32 cents, Minnesota 35 cents, 33 cents in Indiana, and 34 cents in Iowa. No employees covered in the Washington survey earned less than 30 cents an hour, while 86 percent of the workers in Maryland, 43 percent in New York, nearly 12 percent in Illinois, 29 percent in Wisconsin, 13 percent in Minnesota, 40 percent in Indiana, 26 percent in Iowa earned less than 30 cents.

Washington string-bean cannery workers earned an average of 45 cents an hour in 1938, as compared to an average hourly wage of 24 cents in competing string-bean canneries in Maryland, and 26 cents in New York. All Washington workers in such plants earned 30 cents or more an hour, while this was true of only 10 percent of those in Maryland.

The lumber industry in Washington would be placed at a serious competitive disadvantage with respect to other lumber-producing States by the provisions of the Barden bill exempting from the wage standards of the act lumber mills employing less than 15 men. Under this provision more than 98 percent of the lumber produced in Washington would be subject to the act. In the Northeastern States of New Hampshire, Maine, and Pennsylvania, on the other hand, 50 percent of the production would be exempt from the act's minimum wage; in the South Atlantic States of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia 30 percent of the production would be exempt, and in the Central States (Kentucky, Tennessee, West Virginia, and Ohio) 44 percent would be exempt. The enormous handicap under which the Washington lumber industry would be placed in competing for markets with lumber produced in the other States just mentioned is apparent.

Wages in Washington logging camps, sawmills, and lumber plants are the highest in the entire United States lumber and timber industry, due largely to effective union organizations. Washington lumber competes with lumber produced under nonunion conditions in other States, where prior to the Fair Labor Standards Act low wages prevailed. The Barden bill, exempting most plants in many of these States from the wage standards of the act, will once more subject Washington lumber to the cutthroat competition of lumber produced under substandard labor conditions.

There are more than 11,000 cannery workers in the State of Washington, as well as thousands of workers in apple, lettuce, and other fresh fruit and vegetable packing houses, whom the Barden bill would exempt from the act's wage provisions.

Figures on earnings cited are based on data obtained by the Women's Bureau, United States Department of Labor, which are set forth in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 2265; 1938 figures show wage rates which prevailed before the Fair Labor Standards Act became effective; 1939 figures show wage rates which prevailed while the 25-cent rate was effective.

RESIST EFFORTS TO EVISCERATE LIBERAL LEGISLATION

Mr. Chairman, we are continually confronted in this Congress with frantic efforts being exerted by predatory groups and their sympathizers, and by reactionary interests in general, to emasculate, eviscerate, or abrogate in entirety progressive legislation. The first 6 years of the New Deal embraced a program of consideration and adoption, of reform legislation, the objective of which was to lighten the burden of the common man; to effectuate a more equitable distribution of wealth; to mitigate the disparity between entrenched financial power in the hands of the few and the indigence imposed upon the distributees of such financial power. For this purpose many administrative agencies were created and given wide latitude and extensive powers. The manipulations of stock-market operators were circumscribed; the main causes of bank failures were eliminated; customers' deposits were guaranteed; the issuance of securities based on wind and water was ended nationally; a limitation was placed upon the hours of work and a minimum wage was provided for employees of industries engaged in interstate commerce.

Now, however, we are confronted with the dilemma of defending these measures against both concerted and sporadic attacks. Arrows barbed with vitriol are being shot into our legislative mill. The air is oppressed with lugubrious croakings of those who would return us to "normalcy" and balance the Budget at the expense of human misery. Vast financial resources are being employed in a puissant effort to weaken, undermine, and circumscribe the functionings of Federal agencies in the interests of the masses. Those voracious groups upon whose muddied boots certain progressive Federal agencies have trod are squirming like stuck pigs. The tories are emerging from their rabbit warrens. Factitious liberals are now boldly resuming the true color of their original raiment. Let no one delude himself that the people have changed. Gallup polls continue to reveal that the majority of the American people are liberal in their predilections and favor the continuation of a progressive program of legislation. They want no detours or surrenders. Certain political events in recent weeks reveal this fact conclusively. Let the Members who have been reading the wrong columnists and have been enmeshing their minds in editorials appearing in reactionary newspapers, discern the signs of the times.

Mr. Chairman, personally, I will not be a party, wittingly, to any program seeking to turn back the clock. The time has come to call a spade a spade and recognize and earmark legislation for what it is and what it seeks to bring about.

Any measure which would exempt vast numbers from the operations of a wage and hour bill will not find favor with the rank and file of the American people. Iron out inequities, of course; eliminate irregularities and clarify ambiguities, but do not prefer geographic areas; do not restore our fellow Americans to peonage.

TOBACCO COMPANIES VIOLATE WAGE-HOUR LAW

An example of the kind of interests seeking to emasculate the wage-hour law is contained in a recent press release setting forth the fining of two very large tobacco first-processing companies in North Carolina. The press release describes the fining of the Southern Tobacco Co., of Wilson, N. C., and the James I. Miller Tobacco Co., of Henderson, N. C., $7,000. The companies were also ordered to make restitution of $20,000 to some 700 employees.

The Southern Tobacco Co. processes leaf tobacco and tobacco stems, and the Miller Co. sells and distributes the Southern Co.'s products. These two companies supply the giant tobacco corporations, which do the final processing of the tobacco into cigarettes, pipe tobacco, and other finished products. The two companies are extremely close to these giant corporations.

The companies were found guilty of failure to pay the minimum wage, failure to pay overtime, failure to keep adequate records, falsification of records, and the shipping in interstate commerce of goods produced in violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The actual discovery of the violations by these two handmaidens of the giant tobacco corporations was almost accidental. The records kept by the two companies showed that they were paying the minimum wage. But the fact was that the minimum wage was actually being divided twice and three times among employees who were not listed on the records. In off season, when these employees went to the State unemployment-compensation offices to try to get compensation, the officials in those offices went to the companies and asked for their records. The first group of employees who went to the unemployment-compensation offices and made claims were threatened by individuals serving the interests of the two companies and told that they would be jailed for false claims and seeking to injure the companies if they did not desist. But the number of those applying for claims was so large that the officials of the State unemployment compensation administration simply had to look into the matter. Through these officials it was brought to the attention of the regional enforcement office of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The decision of Federal Judge Meekins on March 20, 1940, was the result.

Now I submit that this story of actual happenings in one of the richest industries in the country is clear evidence of the type of motivation behind the Barden and other amendments designed to remove a million and a half of the lowest-paid employees from the protection of the act. These two companies which kept false records showing that they were paying the minimum wage when, in fact, they were splitting that minimum wage two ways and sometimes three ways to other employees not listed on their books, typify the inhuman extent to which interests are willing to go to protect their large margins and destroy the law. These two companies, paying as low as 5 and 10 cents an hour to employees in this first processing operation, are certainly not the type of employers this Congress wants to prevail in our land. On the basis of humanity and morals much might be said regarding them, and others like them. I content myself with merely pointing out the facts, and saying that from an economic point of view they are tragically short-sighted in that their unwillingness to participate in spreading the much-needed purchasing power in the lowest-income groups will in the end defeat the whole economic machine out of which they are now taking their handsome profits.

Now, more than ever, is there exigent need for the expansion and strengthening of the Wage and Hour Act. The following illustration is a case in point:

WAGE AND HOUR DIVISION FINDS WORKERS GETTING 1 CENT PER HOUR

Investigation of a Syracuse, N. Y., firm by the Wage and Hour Division revealed the company, one of the largest employers of home workers in the country, was paying wages as low as 1 cent an hour, and that the majority of workers were receiving less than 5 cents an hour. The company produces hand-knitted and crocheted infants and children's wear and women's bed jackets and employs between 2,000 and 3,000 home workers from Maine to Virginia and into the Midwest. A Federal grand jury returned a 21-count indictment against the company on April 19.

NORTH CAROLINA LABOR SPEAKS

It is interesting to note that the North Carolina Federation of Labor, in State convention in Raleigh on August 14, 1939, passed a resolution vigorously denouncing the author of the Barden amendment, and criticizing it in no uncertain terms. The gentleman from North Carolina incurred the wrath of this State body of the A. F. of L. because of his proposed amendments to the wage and hour bill, and in connection therewith Maj. A. L. Fletcher at such convention charged that—

The Fair Labor Act is being subjected to one of the most vicious counterattacks known in the history of labor legislation. Enemies of labor are trying to kick the foundation from beneath the act in the pretense of doing something for agriculture. Behind that smoke screen they have tried to regain this salient so recently won, and they will try again. If they succeed, nothing less can be expected than further attacks by victorious reactionary forces on other positions so dearly gained and held by labor.

Throughout the country those who support the Barden amendment have been designated the "dime-an-hour bloc." This is a black eye which has been handed the South. I agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] when he fulminated on this floor that the South cannot prosper or progress on the basis of low wages and long hours.

Why should not there be more uniformity in wages in the United States? In Seattle they sell a high-grade shoe for $7.95 a pair; in Raleigh, N. C., the same pair of shoes costs the same price. Yet in Seattle the shoe salesman is paid $40 per week, while in Raleigh the shoe salesman is paid but $15 per week. In Tacoma, Wash., the price of Coca-Cola is the same as it is in North Carolina—5 cents—yet the soda clerk in Tacoma gets $22.50 per week, while the clerk in North Carolina receives but $10. One can purchase the same make of mouse trap, Hershey bar, chewing gum, aluminum ware in Portland Oreg., as he can in North Carolina at the same retail price, but the clerk in North Carolina receives less than half the wage that is paid to the clerk on the Pacific coast.

Query: Who benefits by the low wages paid in the South? Not the worker. Not the consumer—the consumer pays just as much for his goods in the South as the buyer does on the west coast. There is something wrong somewhere.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I hope that the Barden bill is decisively defeated in this House.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE].

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection at this time to the objective of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE]; but in order to obtain that, I do not believe it is necessary to adopt his amendment, which would strike out the pending section.

This section, as I understand, is intended to enable farmers to use labor on the farm in what are called small tractor or portable-sawmill operations. It is barely possible that the number of those employed might not be as many as 15. A smaller number is usually employed. But, with all deference, it strikes me that the farmer or the man who has a small tractor or portable mill, who uses this tractor mill after the crops are laid by to manufacture lumber to sell to his neighbors or use on his own farm, should not be within the provisions of this Wage and Hour Act.

As I understand the purpose of the provision of the bill, it is to provide for just such cases. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE] is adopted, it means that the labor generally employed on the farm which on occasion is used by the farmer to operate a small tractor sawmill may not be utilized for that purpose. I call attention to the section which the gentleman proposes to strike out:

> The cutting of timber for manufacture into lumber, or the manufacture, preparing for market, or marketing, of lumber (including handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations), during any calendar year if his employer at no time during such calendar year employed in connection with or incidental to all such operations in the aggregate more than 15 employees.

Those words "in connection with or incidental" are for the purpose of enabling these small tractor sawmills to use farm labor after they have harvested their crops.

I believe, under all the circumstances, there is not any competition between them and the large manufacturer.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I yield.

Mr. MAY. As a matter of fact, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE] would put the small portable sawmill out in the woods on the same level with these large operating companies?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I have said that; yes. My thought is that those large companies are embraced in the existing law. They are all covered by the existing wage and hour law. Personally, I trust the amendment of the gentleman, to strike out this provision intended to help the farmer who uses his farm labor incidentally in connection with this work, will not be adopted and that the amendment will not be agreed to.

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi yields back 2 minutes.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COFFEE of Washington) there were ayes 20 and noes 31.

So the amendment was rejected.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Miss SUMNER of Illinois: On page 7, line 15, after the words "skimmed milk", insert "buttermilk."

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the author of this bill, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN], has already said that line 15 would include buttermilk, but I offer the amendment for the purpose of clarifying the situation and to show what is the intention of the Congress.

It should be made to include an industry operating in the districts of many of us, particularly in Illinois. It affects the farmer both going and coming; that is, it both buys farm products and sells the finished product to farmers; buys buttermilk and then sells it back to the farmer in a consolidated form which is used as hog feed and poultry feed.

This industry employes about 50 individuals in Illinois. It sells to 100,000 farmers. Under existing law it is considered that it is under the wage and hour law, while the competitor, using skimmed milk instead of buttermilk, is not under the wage and hour law.

For that reason I sincerely hope that you gentlemen will see fit in your wisdom to support this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] seek recognition?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the adoption of the Gwynne amendment makes unnecessary the amendment I intended to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HARRINGTON] is recognized.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. HARRINGTON: At the end of section 5, on page 11, line 14 of H. R. 7133, add the following:
> "(c) Section 13 (a) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by inserting after the word 'establishment' in clause 2 thereof the words 'including all banks and trust companies.'"

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment I have just offered is to exempt the many country banks throughout the Nation which are now subject to the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. In most country communities the bank operates as a service establishment. Hardly ever are there more than three or four employees, and in most cases only one or two in the smaller communities.

The amendment does not exempt or exclude all banks as a group. It exempts only those banking institutions from the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 the greater part of whose selling or servicing is intrastate in character. Banking institutions in the large metropolitan centers are far better equipped to enable them to comply with the wage-hour law. The noncity banks of this country are far less able to employ additional help and to meet the requirements of the Wage and Hour Act with respect to the number of hours of employment of their staff members and at the same time give their local customers and farmers and other townspeople the banking service to which those individuals have become accustomed. It is those banks that will get relief from this proposal.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Does not the gentleman believe that the banks have solved this situation pretty well by moving up their closing hours, and so forth?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I do not agree with the gentleman. I know that many banks in the State of Iowa in the small country communities have to strike a balance every afternoon. They have to have at least one employee stay to do the work.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. But may I say to the gentleman we have heard of no bank closing in the United States in recent times, have we?

Mr. HARRINGTON. No; and I want to help them along a little further. I would like to see those banks prosper.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Does not the gentleman feel it would be better not to bring that amendment into this picture?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I think they would get along a lot better if my amendment were adopted.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Has the gentleman any figures showing the amount of compensation received by the employees of these small banks throughout the country—whether or not it is larger than the wage-hour scale anyway?

Mr. HARRINGTON. In most sections—at least in the small communities of my State—I think the ordinary bank teller or clerk gets between $75 and $110 a month. I imagine it is very much the same throughout the Middle West.

Mr. DARDEN of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield.

Mr. DARDEN of Virginia. One of the things that has got to be guarded against in the gentleman's amendment is that the long hours required of the country banker are required not in order to discharge the business of banking but to accommodate the merchants beyond the actual need for accommodation. In shortening hours to get under the Wage and Hour Act the country bank in most every instance has been able to attend to its business. But the country banks as a whole are not rendering the type of service, the very long hours of service desired by the merchants, and I doubt very seriously if those long hours are justified. That is where most complaints come from—not from the bank people themselves on the ground that they cannot attend to their work, but from the merchants on the ground that the banks do not stay open long enough to make change and render other incidental service to the merchants in the small communities.

Mr. HARRINGTON. But the bank itself, of course, after the close of business, must take a balance every day. This requires overtime employment of the same people, and that is what I am trying to correct to enable them to do that without the burden of paying overtime.

Mr. DARDEN of Virginia. So far as the bank work is concerned, they can get all of their work done within the regular hours. Does not the gentleman think that is right?

Mr. HARRINGTON. Yes; I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. REES of Kanssa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield.

Mr. REES of Kansas. As a matter of fact, a number of small banks, the banks in these rather small communities, are closing on Saturday afternoons because they want to comply with the Wage and Hour Act. Is not that correct?

Mr. HARRINGTON. That is true in the State of Iowa, and I assume it is true also in the State of Kansas.

Mr. REES of Kansas. And in a great many of the States, but there is a demand that the banks stay open longer.

Mr. HARRINGTON. That is correct.

Mr. REES of Kansas. The gentleman's amendment is limited in its operation.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I limit it to those banks the greater part of whose selling or servicing is in intrastate commerce. This excludes the large banks that do an interstate business. It applies simply to the small country banks, whose business is done, in the case of 99 percent of them, within a radius of 25 miles.

Mr. REES of Kansas. That is true. The amendment would not apply to those banks engaged in interstate business where drafts go to New York and elsewhere.

Mr. HARRINGTON. This is intended to relieve those small country banks whose business is intrastate in character.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield.

Mr. ARENDS. One of the reasons for the banks remaining open for only a few hours a day is because they have to close in order to keep their books and take their balances.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Yes.

Mr. ARENDS. They would like to remain open longer for the service they are rendering in these small communities.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. He is quite correct.

Mr. CARLSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON].

Mr. CARLSON. I think the gentleman has pointed out one of the places in the wage-hour law that should be amended. The banks close on Saturday afternoons in the rural communities and this is a real inconvenience to the farmers and merchants of these sections. The banks are rendering a real service and I think the gentleman's amendment should be adopted. Let us take advantage of an opportunity and correct this situation.

Mr. GEYER of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. GEYER of California. I would like to point out that these little bank clerks get $75 a month. Now the gentleman is going to exempt them and he is going to work those people from daylight to dark.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Oh, no.

Mr. GEYER of California. Let us adopt it and maybe we will kill the whole thing.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HARRINGTON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HARRINGTON) there were—ayes 37, noes 33.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MARTIN of Iowa to section 5 of the substitute offered by Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina: Page 7, after line 4, insert before the period and quotation mark a new clause, as follows: "(2) Any individual employed by a corporation or association, the activities of such corporation being located outside of the corporate limits of any incorporated city or town, when not less than two-thirds of the capital investment of said corporation is in real and personal property used by it in its agricultural pursuits, when two-thirds of its employees are voting stockholders in said corporation, when no individual stockholder in such corporation may own or vote more than one share of voting stock owned by him at any stockholders' meeting, and when each holder of voting stock shares equally in the profits of the corporation after satisfaction of prior obligations; or".

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have introduced is intended to exempt both seasonal and year-round processing of agricultural commodities produced and processed by the Amana Society in my district and by other organizations of similar type. I understand there are approximately 8 or 10 such organizations in the entire United States. In my district this organization owns a tract of land of approximately 26,000 acres and the organization consists of approximately 1,500 people engaged in farming and processing of their products.

Farmers and processors live side by side in their seven unincorporated villages, and, as I stated before, the total population of all seven villages is approximately 1,500 people. Members of the society may be transferred from farm work to processing work as occasion may require, but their processing work is carried on on a year-round basis.

I set out in my remarks in the general debate last Friday the general historical background of this organization, because I wanted to bring the situation before Congress more fully than is possible under the 5-minute rule for amendments. My remarks appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page 5155. As I stated there, the Amana Society was a very prosperous organization until the depression of the last decade. They are still carrying on and they are determined to abide by the laws of the State of Iowa and the Nation, although they are finding it extremely difficult to continue their operations during the long-drawn-out depression, together with the expense and complication brought on through the application of the wage-hour law.

The Amana Society rewards its membership in many ways other than on a dollars and cents wage basis. The organization takes great pride in the quality of its products. In fact, quality rather than price is their goal. The members of this organization also take great pride in their citizenship and their obedience to the laws of the land. There is no finer group of people in the country than the members of the Amana Society. Many of them served loyally in the World War and they have to this date taken care of their own aged and sick and needy. All they ask is to be allowed to continue their joint enterprise of farming and processing their farm products on their own land in their own way.

Last January I received a letter from the Wage and Hour Division, enclosing a copy of some correspondence from Calvert Magruder, general counsel, in which the statement was made with reference to processing of agricultural products by the Amana Society, "the Fair Labor Standards Act makes no express exemption in favor of such organizations or of cooperatives as do some other statutes and the definitions regarding employment in section 3 of the act seem clearly to apply." An opinion written by Mr. Magruder held that the worker-members of the Amana Society are employees of their own organization within the meaning of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. This ruling means that about 534 worker-members of this joint enterprise, as well as 406 nonmember employees are all considered as employees of the society within the meaning of the act.

As I set out in my remarks last Friday, one ground for the ruling is that if in the joint enterprise third persons who are not joint owners are employed, then the relationship of employer and employee is held to exist not only between the corporation and the third person but also between the corporation and the joint owner-worker.

No satisfactory explanation of that ground has ever been made by the Wage and Hour Division, and I frankly cannot see how such a ruling can possibly be justified on that ground. Another ground was that if the direction of the labor is vested in any one member or group, then the relationship of employer and employee is considered by the Department to exist. In other words, these joint owners of this agricultural enterprise cannot arrange for the proper direction of their own work in the processing of their own products on their own land, without placing themselves within the administration of the wage and hour law. That is their fate regardless of the relationship of the member to the organization and the mutual obligations existing and based upon centuries of that relationship in their organization.

The Wage and Hour Division gave no consideration whatever to the difficulty of determining the true value of the security offered the members of this society by the society itself. A result of their arbitrary application of this wage and hour law to this society has given rise to this requested amendment to provide an exception to the wage and hour law so that they may continue unmolested in working their soil and processing their products. They do not want to divide neighbor against neighbor, living under identical conditions, so that some will be within the wage and hour law as to hours and money wages and others not, nor can they afford to place their farmers within the wage and hour law in order to keep up their fair dealing with one another.

As I stated last Friday, the amendment I have offered here is carefully drawn to limit its application to organizations which combine agricultural and industrial pursuits under a joint owner-worker relationship located wholly outside the corporate limits of any city or town and where not less than two-thirds of the capital investment of such organization is invested in property used by it in its agricultural pursuits, and also when two-thirds of its employees are voting stockholders in said corporation.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Do these organizations compete with other business?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Yes; they do.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I believe this started out as a religious group?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. That is right.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. They take care of all of their own charity; they take care of their own relief and take care of all of the things that, for instance, the W. P. A. and other relief bills take care of?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. They take care of their own aged, needy, and unfortunate. They cannot measure their reward or their wages in dollars and cents as simply as is contemplated by this bill.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Some exception was made in the agricultural bill for these people?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Yes; in H. R. 3800.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. That bill was passed by the House and Senate and the Department of Agriculture recognized the peculiar situation.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. That is right. The amendment is drawn so as to narrowly limit it to organizations of this kind. I do not believe it will be profitable for processors to undertake to circumvent the law by organizing, as is provided in this particular amendment. In other words, the requirements are a little too drastic. If you will read it, you will find the requirements are calculated to narrow it down.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I am very much interested in the statement the gentleman is making. Will he tell us how many members there are in these organizations?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I do not know the number in the other States, but in this particular organization to which I refer there are about 1,500 people who belong to the organization. They own about 26,000 acres of land. There are about 550 worker-members and owner-members. They really have the relationship of owner-workers. We have had a ruling from the Wage and Hour Division which holds that they are within the wage-hour law.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. How many other organizations are there besides this one?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Approximately 8 or 10. The Department of Agriculture gave me that information in connection with H. R. 3800.

These good people sent a large number of their membership to the World War, and they are some of the best citizens in my district. They take pride in conforming to the laws of America and the State of Iowa. They are a very thrifty and prosperous people. The hard times struck them, and then came the wage-hour law that worked to their further disadvantage. They cannot measure their reward to the members entirely in dollars and cents. It does not work out that way. This law has hit them extra hard, and it may even mean putting their business organization out of existence. They want to continue their business within the law, and they want their business to continue in existence. The adoption of this amendment will help them. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAMSPECK) there were—ayes 66, noes 5.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BROWN of Ohio: On page 11 line 14, after the period insert, "Notwithstanding any of the foregoing provisions of this subsection, the provisions of section 6 shall apply to all employees engaged in any of the operations specified in subparagraphs (A) to (R), inclusive, of clause (11) of this subsection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply provides that the wage provision of the general wage and hour law shall apply to the Barden amendments. In other words, we have heard a great deal here in the last 3 days from both the proponents and the opponents of the Barden amendments to the effect that no one in Congress wants to reduce the $12.60 weekly minimum wage now paid. If this amendment is adopted, the industries exempted under the Barden amendment from the provisions of the wage and hour law will be exempted only from the hour provisions and not from the payment of the minimum wages provided for in the wage section of the law. This amendment is very simple. If the gentlemen have been honest in their positions and are consistent in wishing to see that $12.60 per week is the minimum wage to be paid to anyone under this law, everyone will vote for this amendment. I expect unanimous support of the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I certainly take great pleasure in supporting the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] who has just taken his seat. Like him, I have heard many Members rise here during the debate and say no, they would not exempt anybody from the 30-cent-an-hour-wage provision. Here is the opportunity to make good on it.

I wish to devote these few minutes I have to refuting a statement made here yesterday by my beloved colleague the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] and by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAWKS], who set himself up as a judge of my knowledge of farming. I do not claim to be a farmer, and never have, but I do represent some farmers, and some mighty good ones. If the gentleman from Wisconsin and my colleague from Georgia, either one, would take the trouble to look up the district I represent, they would find that I have a farming section extending 75 miles north and south on the Chattahoochee River where several thousand farmers are engaged in all types of agriculture. That district runs east and west over 50 miles, and includes several hundred dairies that supply the Atlanta market, as well as several hundred truck and poultry raisers who are interested, of course, in agricultural conditions.

I do not claim to be an expert on farming processes, but I have made personal inspection of canning plants, and I know something about the intense humidity that exists in those plants, and the trying conditions under which these people work.

I have based my position on this bill not upon hearsay but upon my own observations and my own knowledge of the conditions existing in my own and other States, and upon the historical conditions that we have had in the South during the years since the War between the States. We have tried to maintain the old type of civilization in the South, which has "gone with the wind," and the day has come, it seems to me, when we may as well forget that. What we need to do in this country is to raise the income of the farmers, and we cannot do it by lowering the income of the people who buy their products. This is why I am opposed to the Barden bill, because it seeks to exempt from both the wage and hour provisions.

The gentleman from Missouri read a most interesting letter here a while ago which some of you heard. In that letter a representative of one of his canneries said that if they had a 60-hour week they would not need it very often but that would be sufficient. The Norton bill, the bill reported by the committee, gives them a 60-hour week throughout the year, and, in addition, gives them 14 weeks, which they can select at any part of the year or from time to time as desired, to operate without any limitation of hours whatever. Why should we go any further? What necessity is there for going any further, except to take out of the pockets of some of the lowest-paid workers in America the mere pittance of 30 cents an hour which they need to buy farm commodities with. That is what the Barden bill does. I cannot go along with it.

There has been a rumor here on the floor that the committee is going to desert its own bill. I cannot speak for anybody else, but I am going to vote against the Barden bill and for the committee bill, and I am going to vote it straight down the line whenever the chance comes to me.

I believe we ought to have amendments. I believe we ought to eliminate the area of production. We ought, for these processors of farm products, to fix hours at 60 per week, as we have done in the committee bill, which gives everybody as long as they need or ought to have to work any human being in a canning plant or a packing plant in this enlightened age. [Applause.]

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired on section 5.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further amendments to section 5? If not, we will turn to section 6. Are there any amendments to section 6?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DIRKSEN: On page 11, line 19, strike out the period and insert a comma and the following: "or (4) any employee employed during any calendar year in connection with or incidental to the wholesale distribution of goods by an employer, more than 50 percent of whose dollar sales volume during the preceding calendar year consisted of sales to retailers of agricultural food products."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, section 13 of the original Fair Labor Standards Act deals with exemptions and subsection (b) of that act exempts those who are under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission or under the provisions of the Motor Carrier Act.

This amendment will add an exemption there to include those employees who are working for wholesale grocers—that is what it amounts to—50 percent of whose dollar volume is in the form of agricultural food products.

In the first instance the act exempted retailers, but, obviously, the retailer cannot get along unless he has some goods to sell, and everywhere in the country you have small wholesale plants that have a couple of drivers who drive around and service these retail stores. Retail distribution is different from what it was years ago. Once upon a time I was in the grocery business and you used to get all of your goods by rail. Later on came a kind of decentralization and little wholesale plants were set up. Most grocers operate on small inventories; that is, these small, independent grocers. They buy a couple of cases of this and a couple of bundles of that and a few bags of this and they have to have service all the time. They do business out in the neighborhood and they open up early and they keep open late. Lots of people have no refrigerators and, of course, all of these grocery stores keep open late hours in order to give them the benefit of refrigeration of meats and vegetables and things of that kind. So there has grown up a difficulty, because no matter how well he pays his chauffeurs or drivers, the Wage and Hour Act comes in, and, of course, he has to pay overtime, and this is somewhat of a penalty on the wholesaler. Since we started out in the first instance and exempted the retailer, why not give the small wholesaler a break who sells agricultural food products?

There is no provision in this amendment relating to wages. That is not involved at all. There is only the matter of saving him against a penalty if a driver has to make a hurry-up call with a rush order of a bag of navy beans to a store 12 or 15 blocks from the wholesale plant. It is simply doing nothing more than expediting and facilitating wholesale food service to the retailers in most of the communities of the country, and since the element of wages is not involved, only the element of hours, it occurs to me that this amendment ought to commend itself to the favorable consideration of this committee.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. By agricultural food products does the gentleman mean coffee, tea, sugar, spices, beans, and all of the customary things that come under agriculture?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Whatever would be implied in any ruling that was made by the Administrator relating to agricultural food products, but it has particular relationship to the products and growth of this country, and more especially to the perishables.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman would not take in very many wholesalers with his amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think it would take in most of the wholesalers, because distribution in that field has changed a great deal in the last few years.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman's amendment simply indicates to the House what happens when you try to place all business in a legislative strait jacket such as we have done before——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Precisely.

Mr. DONDERO. It simply imposes conditions upon business so they cannot operate, or it penalizes labor so that they must discharge labor in order to get along.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Now, another thing about it. I know lots of boys who work for wholesalers and they have never complained about it. However, there comes a time if a wholesaler is technically in violation of the act and there is an accumulation of overtime, and suddenly an employee is aggrieved for one reason or another and then presents his case in court, the Fair Labor Standards Act is self-enforcing, with the penalties written in the law. Suddenly the wholesaler is caught unawares and his business almost placed in jeopardy as a result of a possible implication of the law as it stands at the present time.

We have relieved the retailer and I see no reason why the small wholesaler, whose sales of agricultural food products are in excess of 50 percent of his dollar volume, ought not to have the same benefit so that he can in more facile manner conduct his business and provide service for the retailers in the area that he may serve.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other amendments to be offered to section 6?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon section 6 and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not blame my Republican friend the gentleman from New York, Mr. BRUCE BARTON, for being apprehensive lest there be a case of mistaken identity in regard to the parentage of the Barden bill. He was very nice and genial about it. He even went so far as to say that research of the family trees of himself and the gentleman from North Carolina might indicate that they are cousins, but he made it clear that that relationship would not extend to this legislative creature conceived in the fertile brain of the gentleman from North Carolina. The physiognomy of the Barden bill is so repulsive to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON] that he does not want anyone in the United States to think that it is his creature. I do not blame him for that, but I feel it is something for my Republican friends to think about regarding this bill; for if the Barden bill passes this House, the responsibility is going to be the responsibility of the Republicans, because, notwithstanding the fact that its sponsor be a gentleman on the Democratic side of the House, more Democrats will vote against the bill than will vote for it. If it passes, it is going to pass because of Republican votes. It remains for the gentlemen on the Republican side to determine whether or not they think the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON] was right with regard to the fact that he wanted no one to think that he had anything to do with this piece of legislation, and whether the Republicans as a party are willing to accept responsibility for its passage, because that is just what the situation is going to be. As I say, more Democrats will vote against it than will vote for it. If it passes, the responsibility will be the responsibility of the Republican Party.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Under what line of reasoning does the gentleman hold that a small Republican minority in a New Deal controlled Congress and administration can be held responsible for the enactment of legislation introduced and sponsored by a New Deal leader?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Oh, I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech. I repeat, if this legislation passes, the responsibility will be upon the Republican Party. I hope they are not going to say to the country that they are responsible for its passage, for they certainly will not be able to place responsibility on the Democratic side, because in overwhelming numbers we are going to vote against the bill, and I hope we will be joined by those who say they like to be considered as friends of the underprivileged and of labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on section 6.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHENS: On page 11, line 19, after the word "act", insert the following: "; or (4) foremen having the right to hire or fire or recommend hiring and firing; and service, maintenance, and other workers not engaged directly in the production of goods for commerce."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is desired to provide a limited exemption from the maximum-hours provisions of the act, but not from the minimum-wage provisions. To give production employees opportunity to get a full week's work every week, which almost uniformly they want to have, it is necessary that certain other employees be available a few extra hours each week. Maintenance and service workers must keep the plant in operating condition.

In its present form, as interpreted by the Administrator, the wage and hour law is applied to many employees not engaged in the production of goods for commerce. It is generally neither necessary nor desirable to exempt such employees from the minimum-wage provisions. Most of such workers are already paid substantially more than the minimum wage. But the application of the maximum-hours provisions has seriously curtailed the earning power, not only of these workers but of the production employees, who cannot work a full 42-hour week unless repair and maintenance workers and others of that general character are permitted to work a longer week.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further amendments to be offered to section 6?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 5.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. Will the gentleman advise us for what purpose?

Mr. GROSS. To offer an amendment.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further amendments to be offered to section 6? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Any amendments to section 7? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Are there any amendments to be offered to section 8?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There is some confusion in reference to what the Barden amendment will do as compared with what the Norton bill will do. The principal objectives of the Barden bill are to clarify the erroneous interpretations of the Wage and Hour Administrator.

The Norton bill, or the committee bill, unless it is amended, legalizes the interpretations that have been made by the Wage and Hour Administrator. The Barden bill embodies essentially the intentions of Congress when the original bill was passed.

There has been some discussion here with reference to the livestock-processing provisions. I want to call your attention to this: The Barden amendment, insofar as it affects the livestock and meat industry, is for clarification purposes only and does not give the processors of livestock any greater exemption than Congress intended to give the industry when it passed the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, with this exception: That 16, instead of 14, tolerance weeks during the year are provided.

The Members of the House will remember that when this legislation was being considered by Congress, the need for flexibility as to hours in the processing of livestock products was recognized. It was pointed out that flexibility is needed because of the highly perishable nature of meat products and because of the wide and irregular fluctuation of livestock receipts in the terminal market. Congress recognized this need and provided under section 7 (c) of the Fair Labor Standards Act that the limitation of hours should not apply—

> In the case of an employer engaged * * * in handling, slaughtering, or dressing * * * livestock * * * during a period or periods of not more than 14 workweeks in the aggregate in any calendar year * * * to his employees in any place of employment where he is so engaged.

Congress intended, and everyone believed, that under this language any processor could work any present employees at a packing plant, where livestock is slaughtered and dressed, 14 weeks without the payment of overtime penalties. This is what Congress clearly intended and is a reasonable interpretation of the plain language used.

Fourteen months after this act became a law, the Wages and Hours Administrator, Mr. Andrews, without notice to any interested parties and without any hearing, undertook to interpret this language by a bulletin and held that the exemption only applied to the employees working on the killing floor and only applied to the employer and not to the employees. This interpretative bulletin, No. 14, for all practical purposes repeals the exemption which Congress had given the livestock and meat industry. If the hours exemptions were to be limited only to the operations listed by the wage and hour officials, the flow of livestock through marketing channels would be dammed up, creating the very condition which Congress hoped to avoid through the application of these same exemption provisions of the law.

It should be understood that this exemption applies only to the hours provision and has nothing whatever to do with the wage provision. It should also be pointed out that the wage scale in the packing industry runs from 60 cents to $1.27 per hour, and, according to the latest figures from the Department of Labor, the packing industry pays a higher average hourly rate, a higher weekly rate, and a higher yearly income than the average of all industries reporting to the Department of Labor.

Every livestock shipper is interested in preserving these tolerance weeks from overtime penalties because if the packer is forced to pay time and a half during these seasonal runs of livestock to the terminal markets the shipper knows he is the one that must stand the burden of that extra cost through lower prices for his livestock. Without this exemption, some packers would not purchase in excess of what they could process in a regular workweek, and, as a consequence, could put their product on the market at a lower cost than the packer who cleaned up the yards and had to pay time and a half overtime. This, of course, would tend to force all packers to refuse to purchase in excess of what they could process during a regular workweek, or pay a lower price for the livestock that would be processed with overtime penalties. In either case the shipper would lose. If the packers refused to buy, the shipper would stand a serious loss in shrink and yardage expense. If the packer had to pay time and a half overtime to process the product, and could not pass it on to the consumer because of competition, the shipper undoubtedly would be forced to bear the burden through lower prices for his livestock.

The Barden amendment will clear up most of the confusion caused by the Administrator's ruling and except for the two additional tolerance weeks, which the farm groups have insisted are necessary, the packing industry is not granted any exemptions under this Barden amendment beyond what everyone thought the original act provided.

The Barden amendment is also necessary to correct the unreasonable construction of the area-production exemptions which Congress provided in the original law to take care of the processing of seasonal and perishable agricultural commodities.

Because of the limited time at my disposal I have confined my remarks to the provisions pertaining to the livestock and meat industry. I am not impressed by the loose talk of some who are opposing the Barden amendment and who try to convey the impression that these amendments would pave the way for the exploitation of labor. The Barden amendments are necessary to specifically put into the law the exemptions that Congress intended in the original act and to remove the confusion and friction that are resulting from the administrative interpretations. Unless clarifying amendments to the wage-hour law are enacted, both labor and industry processing will be placed in a strait jacket under bureaucratic regulations. [Applause.]

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RAMSPECK. Does the gentleman have an amendment to this section?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I can take it up on the next section just as well.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on section 9 and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GROSS) there were ayes 60 and noes 47.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, ought it not be perfectly apparent to every Member in this Chamber what the purpose is behind the offering of all these amendments, and their acceptance, practically without question? Now, let us see exactly where we stand on this thing. I, for one, believe there should be some amendments to the wage and hour law—some clarifying amendments; but are we going to be denied any amendment to this law simply because we are too stupid to see what this thing really means? Here you have a substitute amendment known as the Barden bill, which we have already amended 14 times. Is there a Member of this body who, when he is called upon to vote, will know what he is voting for? Is there a Member of this body who will have any idea what the Barden bill will really mean when you get through emasculating it by these various amendments? I, as a Member of Congress trying to represent my people, will therefore be called upon in a short time to vote "yes" or "no" on a bill which I cannot understand because of these many hurried amendments. There is not a Member of this House, including the author of the substitute himself, who can tell us what this Barden bill will mean when you finally get through amending it.

Now, the very obvious purpose is to so clutter up the Barden bill with amendments that it will be defeated, or perhaps the purpose is to vote for the Barden bill—I do not know which—in the hope that it will ultimately be killed and prevent consideration of the Norton bill.

I want to call the attention of my friends on the Republican side to the danger that you face unless you kill the Barden bill and also kill the Ramspeck bill. You are not going to have a chance to vote on the Norton bill or to offer any amendments to the Norton bill. So far as I am concerned, I am going to vote against the Barden bill with all of its amendments. [Applause.] I am going to vote against the Ramspeck bill. I want an opportunity to honestly and seriously consider the Norton bill, which, if you consider it and study it, you will find, with the acceptance of one amendment which I suggested to the gentleman from Georgia yesterday, will take care of every canning plant in my State and give to them every exemption that any honest person ought to ask for. But I want a chance to vote on that Norton bill. I want a chance to offer amendments. If you vote up this Barden bill, we will not have that chance, and you know very well that the Barden bill, as it has been amended, has no chance whatever of ultimate passage. That is the purpose—to kill the whole thing.

Now, I am calling your attention to it because that is the parliamentary situation, and let us not fall into that trap. Let us kill the Barden bill as it has been changed, with all these 14 amendments that no one understands, and let us get back to the bill that was considered by the committee and offer amendments thereto, and let us write decent, sensible legislation and stop the puttering around that we are doing here now.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. Does not the gentleman think that the best way to meet the objective he is talking about, of having decent, sensible legislation, is to refer the whole matter back to the committee, where it can be properly studied?

Mr. KEEFE. I do not, because the committee has studied it, and the committee brought us the substitute for the Norton bill. We have that before us now. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time for debate on section 9 has expired.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to section 10.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAMSPECK: Page 14, line 17, strike out the word "accrued" and insert "is discovered by the employee affected."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, subsection (b) of section 10 limits the rights of an employee to sue for wages not paid in accordance with the act. The language of the Barden bill limits this right to 6 months from the date the action accrues, even though the employee may not know he is entitled to it. This amendment simply gives him a 6-month period after he discovers his rights; and I think perhaps the gentleman from North Carolina will agree with me that the employee ought to have at least that long to employ a lawyer and file suit after he finds out he has not been properly paid.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina rise in opposition to the amendment or in support of the amendment?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I do not rise in opposition, but I would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield in order for me to ask a question of the gentleman from Georgia about his amendment?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I prefer not to yield.

Mr. Chairman, let us review a little history in connection with this legislation.

When the Norton bill was reported from the committee I voted for the Norton bill. When I appeared before the Rules Committee I appeared for the Norton bill and was for the Norton bill. I think the bill which I had presented was in better shape and presented the questions that had arisen in better shape than did the Norton bill. But let me say to the membership of the House at this time that the amendments which have been adopted are objectionable to me. I do not like the amendments which were suggested in connection with the banking institutions, and so forth. I fear I recognize why they were adopted. When the amendment with reference to hours came up a minute ago I noticed that a great many Members voted for the amendment. There was no discussion of the amendment.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Not at this time.

Mr. Chairman, let me say to the membership now that I am not for the so-called Barden bill as it now is, and I expect to vote against its substitution. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I shall be pleased to.

Mr. COX. In view of the fact that the gentleman is laying down on his proposition, is it not agreeable to him for the debate to be suspended and a vote taken killing it?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I do not like the phrase "lay down." There has never been one drop of fighting blood in the gentleman's veins more than there is in mine, but I am after some legislation that will relieve the agricultural situation in this country, and I say that this bill now loaded with the amendments—and most of the amendments I must say were loaded on by the Republican side of the aisle, not by the Democrats in this House—entirely alters its original purpose.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. No; I do not care to yield.

If this situation has arisen, why should I let pride of authorship stand in the way of advantageous and constructive legislation? [Applause.] Never for a minute have I had any pride of authorship superior to my desire for constructive legislation. All I wanted was that the agricultural situation should be dealt with properly and wisely. I say to you now that the bill I originally supported and tried to bring on this floor is better than this substitute with the amendments attached.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Yes; I shall be pleased to.

Mr. KEEFE. It is a fact, is it not, that the original bill bearing the name of the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] is the committee substitute?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. And that the bill before us represents the considered judgment of the Committee on Labor.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. May I say to the gentleman that I am a member of the Committee on Labor and took part in the discussion of every provision of that bill. The thing that brought about the trouble, remember, was the fact that the committee directed its chairman to use every parliamentary means to bring that bill before this House, and there was a refusal to bring that bill before this House.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. The gentleman surely has not forgotten that the chairman of the committee, with the advice of the leadership of the House, brought up that bill under a suspension of the rules; that she did exactly what she was directed to do. The gentleman certainly has not forgotten that, has he?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. May I say to the gentlewoman from New Jersey that while she asked to bring it up under suspension of the rules, that was not the direction given to the gentlewoman by the committee. The committee told her to use every parliamentary means possible.

The gentlewoman was directed to use every parliamentary means possible, and the normal, customary way of bringing legislation before this House is through the Rules Committee under a rule.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I am delighted to yield.

Mrs. NORTON. And the chairman of the Labor Committee then endeavored to get a closed rule. I am perfectly willing to take the responsibility for requesting a closed rule, because I knew that what would happen is exactly what has happened. The wage and hour provisions would both be destroyed and the principle of the bill wiped out with the amendments that were to be offered. I take full responsibility for that.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. May I say to the gentlewoman from New Jersey that I have not lost confidence in the House. If the full membership of the committee had been here I think we would have been in pretty good shape. We will come out of it yet. Do not think I have lost confidence in the House or in the American people. Something good will come out of this fight yet.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, I have been a member of the House Labor Committee during my four terms of service in this body. I labored diligently for the passage of the wage-hour legislation because at the time the measure was debated and passed, I felt the principles of that proposal needed to be written into the law of this Nation. I have declined until this moment to take part in the debate upon the so-called Barden, Ramspeck, and Norton bills because I did not want to be misunderstood in connection with any utterances that I might make.

I recall that on June 14, 1938, when this House was considering the conference report on the wage and hour bill, I stood here in the Well and said:

This measure is not 100-percent perfect.

There are those of us who have felt that there should be amendments to the act so that the hardships wrought in some instances to certain seasonal business could be eliminated. We did not, however, desire to see the legislation torn asunder by foes who neither at the time of its passage or now have favored this great humanitarian effort in pioneering to aid the low-wage earner of America.

If I may be indulged another reference, I recall my statement of May 4, 1938, when in the course of House debate I stated that there was a need for the establishment of the principle of wage-hour legislation. I feel just as strongly now that we cannot allow enemies of the act to wreck its helpful features even though it had been my hope that we could draft and pass amendments to take care of the very bad situation which has arisen through the failure of the Administrator to properly define "area of production."

Since the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] rises and makes the statement that he will not support his own bill as it now has been amended, I feel that I should make just a very brief comment at this time. In my opinion, the gentleman from North Carolina, in the fostering of his bill, has been genuinely interested, as he understood it, not in the utter emasculation of the present act but in an earnest desire to be of service in the equalization of the benefits of this law and in wiping out any disadvantages of the law so far as any particular group of people in this country are concerned. The trouble in which we find ourselves today in the administration of this act is due to the rulings and the opinions which have been given by the Administrator of the Wage-Hour Division in connection with the promulgation of those regulations which affected labor and especially the preparing of fresh fruits and vegetables in this country. I attended many of these hearings with other Members of Congress to argue against the rulings of the Administrator from the standpoint of area of production, but we were met with an almost adamant attitude. I have been plainly discouraged and saw no way out but to support certain amendments to help agriculture. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] has said that he will not allow his support to go further with his bill, which is weighted down with those amendments which strike at the very heart of the Wage and Hour Act. Personally, as one member of the Labor Committee, I admire the frankness and the fearlessness of the gentleman from North Carolina in standing in this House this afternoon and saying that he will not allow his prestige to be carried further in connection with the Barden bill, for, just as the gentleman from Wisconsin said, the bill has been loaded down with crippling amendments.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. Does the gentleman favor the adoption of the committee substitute to the Norton bill?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I was a member of the committee that voted to report that bill out, because I felt we had given it most careful consideration, and that upon the floor of the House amendments could be offered, and perhaps we could bring about a correction of the inequalities in the present law.

Mr. KEEFE. Does the gentleman believe, in view of the present situation, that we should not get ourselves into the position where we will not have an opportunity perhaps to even consider the Norton bill?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think it should be considered and the House given the opportunity to amend it.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am very much confused, for I said I would vote for the Barden bill. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] has not told us what amendments have been added that he does not like. Was it the Brown amendment?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; I do not so understand.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Is the gentleman opposed to the Barden amendment at this time because of the amendment I offered placing a floor under wages?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I may say to the gentleman that I was called from the floor at the time his amendment was offered and passed. There were perhaps a dozen other amendments that were passed which are objectionable. I have not said anything about the gentleman's amendment.

There are other amendments which have been added that I certainly do not favor.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Is it not very likely that what has happened to the Barden amendments will also happen to the Norton amendments? Amendment after amendment will be tacked on to the Norton bill, and those of us who are in favor of the principles of the Fair Labor Standards Act will find ourselves at the end of the reading of the Norton bill in the same identical position that we now find ourselves at the end of the reading of the Barden bill. Would it not be more advisable for the Committee to now rise and report the bill back with the enacting clause stricken out, then the committee can make a real study of the Fair Labor Standards Act. By such a procedure we will prevent the destruction of this law which was enacted for the protection of American workers.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I believe the action of the Administrator in the past in connection with the area-of-production provision has been absolutely wrong. We have tried to correct that situation. This House can and must meet its responsibility.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, a great many things might be said in answer to the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] if we on this side cared to get into the same situation you are in over on the majority side, but we do not. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE], in substance, charged that the Members of the House did not know what was now before them; that we should vote down the Barden amendments and that, if one certain amendment was adopted, his people in Wisconsin would be taken care of.

However, the woes of the rest of us, which are due either to the unjust provisions of this act or to its maladministration—which most of the Members on the majority side will admit exist—are not so easily disposed of.

If the gentleman from Wisconsin does not understand the bill, that is not the fault of the members of the committee. It is not the fault of those of us who have read the bill, who for more than 2 years have studied the proposed legislation. For the last 2 years an earnest and conscientious effort has been made to correct certain imperfections that everyone concedes exist in this legislation, one of which, the most serious perhaps, is the one just referred to by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], who, if I understood him correctly, admitted that the act needed amendment; that the Administrator had been at fault in more than one instance.

Not so long ago this afternoon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRADLEY] stated that if this legislation went through, if the Barden bill was adopted, the responsibility would rest on the minority side. I well recall that in the honeymoon days of this administration the gentlemen on that side almost without exception were perfectly willing to be the rubber stamp of the occupant of the Executive Mansion and say that whatever was wanted down there they would stand for here on the Hill.

As a matter of fact, there was more or less of a scramble on the majority side to see who could be the first to proclaim his loyalty to, and the length to which he would go to carry out the slightest wish of, the Chief Executive. A smile from the occupant of the White House was ample reward for support of what was then termed "must" legislation.

Now, in the days of adversity, after the honeymoon is over; after the chickens have come home to roost; after the bad effects of the quack remedies which have been rammed down the throats of the American people have been demonstrated; after the leader has admitted that, notwithstanding the expenditure of untold sums of money, the exercise of unlimited grants of power, his policies have proven to be a failure; when we have the relief problem, for which he knew the remedy; when we are confronted with national bankruptcy and all his cake is dough, you want to pass the responsibility over to the Republican side and cast upon us the burden of getting you out of the mess you have gotten into.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRADLEY] said just a few moments ago that upon this side rested the responsibility for the legislation which was now before the House. If you will let us alone and agree to accept the legislation which we will advocate, we will go into conference over here and hand you some, which will not only put us on the road toward prosperity, but will give us once more in this country constitutional government.

Accepting legislation from us should be nothing new to you because your legislative ideas have been furnished and your legislative measures have been handed to you by executive departments and by the bureaus and the heads of departments down there for the last 6 years, so I do not know why you should balk now, having become accustomed to the practice of taking what is handed you.

There are some over here who, as I stated before, with reference to this legislation and with reference to other labor legislation, have been endeavoring for 2 years and more to bring forth constructive amendments. Every time we proposed one you would charge us with being antilabor. Now, go to the country in November, if you wish, with the N. L. R. A. and the wage-hour law, as they are—unamended, unfair, unjust, a burden upon those who would give employment; a hindrance to those who would earn a livelihood for themselves were it not for the unfair restrictions contained in those laws. I for one, and I speak only for myself, will be glad to meet you on that kind of a platform with your Labor Board and your wage-hour Administrator, and your David Saposs, and all the rest of that crew that has been uncovered over here by that investigating committee which you control.

From the records of the N. L. R. B. itself has come the evidence which brands it as unfair and biased; as the instigator of labor disputes; as the most unfair, unjust, un-American agency which has ever existed in the history of our country.

Next week strike down, if you will, all amendments to the N. L. R. A.; take that Labor Board with its crew of wreckers, a crew which even its friends now seek to disown, and ask the judgment of the people of America on your refusal to give relief.

I challenge the majority party to go to the country in November with the Wagner law and the wage-hour law unamended.

I say go to the country with that record, which smells to high heaven, and if we do not give you a whipping in November, then I miss my guess. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PARSONS). The gentleman from New York offers a preferential motion which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MARCANTONIO moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I offer this motion in all sincerity and in all earnestness. It is not offered simply for the purpose of obtaining the floor to make a speech. I direct my remarks to every Member of this body who sincerely believes in the basic principles of the fair labor standards law. My own position is well known. I am opposed to both the Barden and Norton amendments. I appeal, however, not only to those who take my position on these two bills, but I also appeal to those who favor only the Norton amendments and to those who seek corrective legislation only, but who do not want to see the act destroyed.

Let us analyze the situation in which we find ourselves, those of us who believe in the principles of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The Barden amendments have been loaded down and they have been practically abandoned, or at least

I think I can safely say that the overwhelming majority of this Committee is opposed to voting for the Barden amendments, and upon the defeat of the Barden substitute and the defeat of the Ramspeck substitute which will follow, of course, we then will be confronted with the Norton amendments.

Now, those of you who are for the Norton amendments—I personally am opposed to them—but those of you who are for the Norton amendments and also are in favor of the basic principles of this act, consider what you are going to be up against. We are going to have added onto the Norton amendments many of the Barden amendments. When the Norton amendments are read for amendment you are going to have amendment after amendment adopted to the Norton amendment and you will find yourselves—those of you who believe in this law—in exactly the same identical position that we find ourselves now after the reading of the Barden amendments. The Fair Labor Standards Act will have been completely knifed. Therefore, there is only one sane procedure and one safe procedure, safe from the standpoint of those who toil and also safe from the standpoint of the farmers, and that is that the enacting clause be stricken out and this entire matter sent back to the committee. Otherwise, you will have to accept the responsibility for the virtual destruction of this act, unless you who favor the Norton amendments support my motion.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. I would like to say to the gentleman that I do not always agree with everything the gentleman from New York says, but on this particular point I agree with him 100 percent, and I think that all of us should take this opportunity to send this bill back to the committee. It is a hodgepodge and the sooner we send it back to the committee the better legislation we will get out of it. [Applause.]

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

I think that in light of the fact that the Administrator is beginning to hold hearings on the question of area of production, in the light of the fact that we are not going to get any real legislation here but amendments that are going to load down the Norton amendments, and in the light of the fact that the Norton amendments will be used by the enemies of the Fair Labor Standards Act as a vehicle with which to ride over this law and kill it, the only just action is to send this bill back.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. In just a moment, please. I want to complete this thought.

Consequently, I make this proposal and I offer this motion in all fairness to both sides of the aisle and in all fairness to those who believe in the basic principles of the Fair Labor Standards Act. I am convinced that the overwhelming majority of this House is in favor of continuing these basic principles. I am also convinced that some of those who seek amendments are doing so in all sincerity and that those who seek to emasculate this law are only a minority, but who will command a majority unless you drop the Norton amendments.

Therefore, I say to the supporters of the Norton amendments, why play into the hands of this minority. Consequently, for the sake of the basic principles of the Fair Labor Standards Act, for the sake of sane and intelligent legislation, there is only one course we can now pursue and that is to send this bill back. First, such a course will insure adequate study and make possible equitable recommendations. Second, the law has not been given sufficient time to demonstrate what changes are needed. Third, and above all, such a procedure will save the act from destruction.

In the name of the American workers and in the name of American farmers I do hope that you will give the proposal which I have made your most serious and earnest consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the preferential motion.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this motion because I believe it is time we passed on fundamental issues. I have listened for almost 2 years to different Members of this House rise on the floor and tell how they love labor, and how they fought for the rights of labor, and how they intend to protect the rights of labor, and then this bill comes here and these amendments are offered and everyone talks about how he does not want to reduce the wages paid to labor, but as soon as an amendment is offered and adopted by this House which writes into the law a continuation of the minimum-wage provisions of the present law, as far as the Barden amendments are concerned, immediately some of these men who have paraded backward and forward across the Well of this House rise in all their majestic glory and wrap the robes of sanctimony around their noble forms and tell us they are opposed to the Barden amendments because of the fact they contain a provision that protects labor and holds the minimum floor of wages at 30 cents an hour. [Laughter and applause.]

I say to you, if you are consistent, if you believe in the rights of labor as you preach here, if you are not a demagog, then you will vote against this amendment and vote for the Barden amendment with the provision in it that protects labor against a reduction of wages.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. MARCANTONIO and Mrs. NORTON to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 127.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

The question was taken.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division, and ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the Clerk again report his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the Ramspeck amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Committee divided; and there were—ayes 84, noes 22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'CONNOR: On page 14, line 16, strike out the words "six months" and insert "two years"; also strike out "six months" in line 17 and insert "two years."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, the language which I seek to change by this amendment has been somewhat helped by the amendment adopted by the House changing it to "date of discovery," rather than "date of accrual," some of the vice was thereby removed, but I wish to call your attention to this:

But no action to recover such liability shall be maintained unless commenced within 6 months from the day when the cause of action accrued—or 6 months from the date of enactment of the Fair Labor Standards Act amendments of 1939.

Or as it is "date of discovery"—

The framers of this law intended for it to be sort of self-executing and reduce the cost of administration. In other words, if the employers of labor did not live up to the law, they could be sued for overtime and back pay. In other words, a suit would lie against the employer; $10,000,000 in suits today are pending against employers for failing to comply with the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. If you adopt this bill as it is written you cannot go back beyond a period of 6 months from the date of the enactment of this bill for recovery for violation of the law, which may have occurred a year or two ago or at any time after the act was passed, and thereby let those employers go scot free who have been violating the law except for the last 6 months. At the present time, in the absence of this law, your local statutes of limitation control. They vary from 3 years to 10 years within which time actions could be maintained. If you adopt this law, then you confine the bringing of actions to a period of 6 months from the date of discovery. That is the shortest limitation with reference to a remedy of this kind that is known in history. I think this amendment should be adopted in justice to labor. I fully analyzed this bill during general debate and showed that it was a clear attempt to scuttle the wage and hour law.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN], for whom I have a very deep regard, and I am confident he is one of the most sincere men on this floor, made the statement in opening the debate upon this bill, upon its being read for amendment, that there was a feeling of unanimity on the part of the farmers in favor of his bill. I think the gentleman was in error when he made that statement. I have in my files a letter dated April 22, coming from Great Falls, Mont., reading as follows:

Our attention has been called to the statement that all farm organizations are favoring amendments to the present wage and hour bill.

We wish to inform you that the Montana division, Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America, is opposed to any amendments to the present Wage and Hour Act. As employers of a considerable number of people, we are satisfied with the present act.

We have had no complaints from any of the cooperatives affiliated with us on the provisions of this act and our membership recognizes that in order to purchase the products of our farms at a price which will enable us to enjoy a fair standard of living, it is necessary that the working people of this Nation be employed and receive a fair wage.

We urge you to oppose any attempt to amend the Wage and Hour Act. We are informed that both A. F. of L. and C. I. O. labor organizations in Montana are opposed to any change in this bill, and we wish to add our support to that of organized labor in this matter.

That is signed by Harold Brown, one of the leading thinkers and students on farm problems in the Northwest, and secretary of the Montana division, Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America, one of the strongest farm organizations in the West. They are opposed to any change in the wage and hour law.

The farmers of this country are not going to be duped in this matter. They fully realize that their market is here at home, provided we will continue to give life to that market by giving to the underpaid labor 30 cents an hour. There is no doubt but that underconsumption is the cause of farm surpluses today. It is not overproduction. Give the American people enough to eat and that will solve the problem. We must not forget that the great bulk of farm products is foodstuffs. Millions of ill-fed and ill-clothed people, farmers and city workers alike, look to us and have a right to look to us for help. Let us overwhelmingly defeat these Barden amendments. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRIES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first word.

Mr. Chairman, this certainly has been a field day for the Members of Congress to pay tribute to the American farmers. I never heard so much baloney about our American farmers as I have heard in the past few days.

I happen to represent a district which has 15,223 farmers, a group of the finest people in America, and I am always happy to vote for legislation beneficial to their cause. I have not as yet received one word from any farmer in that district asking me to vote for the Barden amendment or any other amendment to emasculate the wage and hour law. The only farmers that I know of who are interested in the Barden amendments and emasculation of the wage and hour law are farmers who spend their winters in Florida and their summers in Canada.

We in America who believe that the 11,000,000 people in this country who have been benefited by the Fair Labor Standards Act needed this legislation to bring them out of the sweatshops and out of the slave areas in this country think they are entitled to the same consideration from this United States Congress as any financiers or any other group of people in this United States.

I am bitterly opposed to any amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act which will bring harm to the American people, people who have a right to live as American citizens under this form of government. Those who believe that the masses of the common people are born to be herded into corrals of misery and suppression to serve the whims and wishes of the privileged groups are absolutely in sympathy with emasculating all humanitarian legislation. I say to those people that the reason we have the war in Europe at this moment is because the representatives of those governments, responsible to the people that they represented, failed to recognize the rights of the common people and caused such fear, hatred, distress in those countries that it eventually brought about this horrible war.

I am saying to the people from the South I am very happy we have such a man as the gentleman from Georgia, BOB RAMSPECK, so vitally interested in the welfare of humanity. The gentleman from Georgia believes that human rights are above property rights. I want to say to some of the other gentlemen from the South, who are constantly endeavoring to destroy every piece of humanitarian legislation, that it is a disgrace the way they operate in the South in dealing with the underprivileged people. People in some sections in the southern part of the country have been disfranchised. American citizens have been denied the right to vote. There are 4 States which have 35 Representatives in this House whose combined vote is less than that cast for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SCHUETZ]. There are 7 Representatives from the State of Mississippi whose combined vote is less than that cast for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], who has the smallest district in the State of Illinois.

If we are going to tolerate such conditions in America we must naturally expect humanitarian legislation to be destroyed. Those people, who believe in property rights above human rights and who are constantly talking about communism, "reds," and un-American activities in connection with needed social legislation, are doing more to bring about that condition of subversive activities than any group anywhere in the United States.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRIES. I yield for a question.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In certain Southern States below the Mason and Dixon's line where they talk much about "reds" and communism they sabotage the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution so that in 7 congressional districts in Mississippi the total vote cast in the 1938 election was less than 36,000, or less than one-half of the vote ordinarily cast in a single congressional district above the Mason and Dixon's line.

Mr. FRIES. That is just what I stated a moment ago. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to section 10? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none.

Are there amendments to section 11?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, if we are trying to perfect the bill, I ask unanimous consent that the date "1939" appearing in line 18, on page 14, be changed to "1940."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there amendments to section 11? The Chair hears none.

Are there amendments to section 12?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to section 12.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin: Page 17, line 4, after the period insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 21. In order to protect the minimum-wage and maximum-hour standards prescribed in sections 6 and 7 it shall be unlawful for any person to import or cause to be imported from any foreign country in any manner or by any means whatsoever, or aid or assist in importing any goods, wares, merchandise, manufactured, produced, or mined wholly or in part in foreign countries unless such imports are produced, manufactured, or mined under the same minimum-wage and maximum-hour provisions which would be applicable if they were manufactured, or produced, or mined in the United States."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered for the purpose of protecting those——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin will suspend. The gentleman from Georgia makes a point of order. The gentleman from Georgia will state his point of order.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this bill. The amendment deals with the question of foreign commerce. The bill deals only with interstate commerce, with wage and hour provisions within this country. The amendment offered by the gentleman undertakes to regulate foreign commerce. It would be more appropriate on a tariff bill than on a bill amending the Wage and Hour Act.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I do, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, the point of order comes too late, because I had started to speak on my amendment before the point of order was made.

In the second place, the gentleman who made the point of order apparently is not familiar with the bill, which, on page 16, section 20, proposes to regulate and prohibit convict-produced goods, not only produced in the United States but in foreign lands. It specifically refers to foreign convict-produced goods; and even though the point of order had been made at the proper time it could not be sustained because this amendment is clearly germane to the bill, as it also relates to foreign production.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman to point out the particular language in the bill to which he refers.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I will read. Page 16, lines 13 to 17:

* * * the United States, or place noncontiguous but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country, into any State, Territory, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, or district of the United States, or place noncontiguous but subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

This language of the bill specifically refers to foreign commerce and foreign products and has a prohibition with reference to convict-produced foreign goods moving into this country.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PARSONS). The Chair is ready to rule.

The section under discussion, known as section 12, page 16, is headed "Prohibition against interstate transportation of convict-made goods," and in the course of describing what shall be prohibited the section does prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of penal- or reformatory-institution-made goods from the States, Territories, and any district of the United States or from any foreign country.

The amendment offered by the gentleman proposes to prohibit the importation into this country of any goods manufactured, mined, or otherwise, from any foreign country that does not comply with our minimum wage rates.

The Chair thinks that in construing this amendment to section 20 it is clearly germane, because it prohibits the importation of foreign-made goods that does not prescribe minimum rates. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered in order to protect agriculture and industry in the United States and the workers employed therein from the unfair, cheap, chiseling competition of foreign imports which are produced by workers who labor long hours for wages which are way below the minimum fixed under the Wage and Hour Act.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot imagine how anyone who speaks on behalf of the working people of the United States when speaking in favor of the Federal Wage and Hour Act will advocate that we should put American industries under the minimum-wage and maximum-hour law and then continue to permit competing imports from foreign countries where the workers work almost twice as many hours for a wage which is much lower than the minimum fixed for competing American industries. If we continue to raise the cost of American production and the importation of cheap foreign imports we will destroy the jobs of many of our American workers who are now employed and make it difficult for the 11,000,000 who are now unemployed to obtain a job. We cannot import the products of cheap foreign labor and then raise the production cost of competing American products. If we do that, we will furnish thousands and thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands, of jobs to workers in foreign lands to the great injury of our American working people.

Remember, it was our Lord who said, "No man can serve two masters." When a vote is reached on my amendment, we will have an opportunity to see who chooses to serve our American workers and who chooses to serve the workers in foreign lands.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. In this connection, it is interesting to point out that ever since 1916 Great Britain, as well as the Scandinavian and other countries, has had a minimum-wage and maximum-hours law.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. All right. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I am helping the gentleman out.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman knows that we import from Cuba, Russia, China, and Japan many products which compete with the products of our American business institutions and the American workers employed therein. In these and other foreign countries the workers receive wages as low as $2 a week, and work as much as 100 hours a week. The gentleman from Massachusetts can point with pride to the wages and hours in Great Britain, but I do not. My amendment proposes to protect our American workers from unfair cheap, chiseling imports from the British Empire, particularly from India, where many hundred million ill-housed, ill-fed, and ill-clothed British subjects toil and sweat for starvation wages, and their maximum-hour limitation is 7 days a week and 24 hours a day.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. We want to follow the Scandinavian countries rather than China and Japan.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Then vote for my amendment. I am now talking about the cheap oriental labor of China and Japan, the half-naked, loin-cloth labor of India, the cheap regimented slave labor of Russia, and the barefoot cheap peon labor of the South American countries and Cuba. The vote on this amendment will reveal where many of the so-called friends of the American working men and women really stand. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the parliamentary situation will permit me to obtain a record roll-call vote on my amendment, for the Good Lord also said, "Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them." Mr. Chairman, a record roll-call vote on this amendment will reveal just where political friends of our working people stand, and whether they take their position on the American workers' side or on the side of the cheap oriental, Indian, Cuban, Russian, and other foreign workers. I take my position on the side of the working men and women of the United States. Where do our New Deal brethren stand? [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out to the members of the committee who really want to remedy what some of us think are defects in the present wage and hour law that if you want to be absolutely certain you will not get any amendments at all, you ought to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. We all know that it would be necessary for the President to veto any bill if it contained such an amendment. It is in direct conflict with the trade-treaty program, which the Congress has recently extended, and cannot be effective in legislation of this kind.

All of us would like to see the standard of living in America protected, and most of us have voted for measures which tended to protect that standard of living; but there would be absolutely no way for the Wage-Hour Administrator to determine whether or not this amendment was complied with. It would be unworkable and almost impossible of administration. We had this question up in the committee when the original act was considered. The late beloved Billy Connery, of Massachusetts, felt very strongly about it, and at first I was inclined to agree with him, but it was pointed out to us by representatives of the State Department, the Tariff Commission, and other agencies that would have to deal with this matter that it would be utterly impossible to place such a provision in an act of this kind and have it administered satisfactorily. So if you want to destroy any possible amendments to the wage-hour law at this session, then vote for the gentleman's amendment. If you want to solve this problem, I hope you will vote the amendment down.

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, as a member of the House Committee on Agriculture, and a textile man when I am home, and interested vitally in the unemployment of some 9,000,000 or 10,000,000 people in this country, I wish to call your attention to one thing that is taking place now, and I am going to tell you, at the expense of possibly not interesting you, how I came upon this particular matter of which I speak.

I happen to deal in white uniforms for nurses. A gentleman came into my store, and he had the standard $15.75-a-dozen aprons, which he quoted me at $12.60. On examination of the material of which these aprons were made—and I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRADLEY] is listening, because he was talking about "chiselers"—being somewhat familiar with most of the textiles in this country, I decided it was not made in the United States. I visited this factory in the city of Cleveland, and the gentleman showed me the piece goods from which this garment was made. It was made in Japan.

The hours of labor have just recently been shortened by the Japanese Government from 96 hours per week to 84 in the interest of public health. They have a situation there of almost convict labor, of forced labor, because many of the girls sign up for 5 years in these textile plants, and they work at about 29 cents a day.

I just called the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and I find that 81,689,000 square yards came into this country last year, and there is evidently now a quota of about 7,268,000 square yards per month.

I examined this piece goods and found that it is laid out in folds all ready for the American cutting machine. Across the end of that piece in letters not over an inch high are the words "Made in Japan." You can tear that right off and throw it away. On the other end of that piece of goods is 3 or 4 inches of extra cloth, made to replace it. This cloth is shipped over here in Japanese ships manned by naval reservists being paid about $4.84 a month, yet we are trying with our subsidized merchant marine to pay a wage of $72.50 for a seaman, and who wants to hire for less?

I have this material here. Look at it. All you have to do is tear that little label off, "Made in Japan," and there are 60 yards of goods that I paid 6½ cents a yard for. Some of you North Carolinians should take that down and see if you can make it in North Carolina for 8½ or 9 cents a yard. There is too much old Kings Mountain Scotch in me to want to expose any person in the State of North Carolina to competition with such sweated labor as that.

These workers live over there in a little huddled place, on a bamboo mat. They bathe in a common pit of hot water. They live worse than any convict, more crowded than any concentration camp you can find in Europe; and they compete with men and women of your race and mine.

I am informed by one of the present Members of the House that while visiting one of the very large Japanese mills some time ago he found that young Japanese girls of about the age of 14 years are brought in from the agricultural areas. Those young girls are then placed inside the factory compounds for a period of about 4 years at a wage rate of $4.50 per month, plus certain other benefits such as food, shelter in factory compound, a small amount of schooling, flower culture, and so forth. Those girls in this manner thus dedicate 4 years of their life to the manufacture of Japanese textiles, largely for export. It is this type of competition the American millworker is up against.

I come back to the language of Confucius, "One picture is worth a thousand words," and here it is. It may not be the reciprocal-trade treaty, but it is part and parcel of what puts 11,000,000 people on the pavements looking for work in the United States of America. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. GROSS. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER) there were—ayes 93, noes 111.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed as tellers Mrs. NORTON and Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 109, noes 120.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SUMNERS of Texas: Page 15, beginning in line 24, strike out all of section 12 as amended.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the section which my amendment proposes to strike out deals with the disposition of prison-made goods.

The Committee on the Judiciary has had responsibility for a long time for dealing with this matter. This is a rather delicate matter to deal with. Many people interested in the rehabilitation of prisoners are fully convinced that there is no substantial chance for their rehabilitation unless they are given a chance to work. Our committee has been able to get those interested in rehabilitation of prisoners, and those interested in protecting the American workingman against prison-made goods together up to this time. The first bill was passed a good while ago. It made prison-made goods subject to the law of the State into which they were shipped. A few years ago additional legislation was had which put the Federal Government at the border line of the State guarding the State against the violation from without of State policy, and making it against the law to ship prison-made goods into a State in violation of the policy of that State.

There is probably some necessity for additional legislation. This year a bill has been introduced in the Committee on the Judiciary which is identical in its effect with this amendment which it is proposed to strike from this bill. Since the introduction of that bill it has been submitted to the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice advises that some of the smaller States, by reason of their inability to equip themselves to take care of all the things which they could use necessary to give reasonable employment to their convicts, so those convicts may fit themselves for life when they retire from their positions, exchange commodities with other smaller States similarly situated. One State will make enough for itself and another small State, and they exchange commodities. Instead of each of them having a fully equipped little factory for each thing produced, one will make one thing and another will make another thing, and they exchange. This bill with the section in it would make that exchange impossible. To do it this way would probably irritate and do harm both to the prisoners and to free labor.

At this time America is tremendously interested in trying to do what it can to rehabilitate these men before they are turned out.

It is not wise legislation, it is bad legislation to deal with so important a thing and so delicate and I may say so difficult a thing in this way. It is recognized by everybody that it is necessary in order to carry this good work on that these prisoners be provided with something to do. The people who are interested in protecting free labor and the people who are interested in these people in prison are now in full agreement as to the scope within which convict labor should be held. The bill in the Committee on the Judiciary, to which I have referred, has disclosed that it is necessary—at least highly desirable—to get the people interested in agreement if possible. You cannot do that on the floor of the House in this sort of situation and the matter ought not to be legislated in this sort of way. We ought not to bring into friction the people who have a common interest in doing something that would be fair to free labor and at the same time calculated to help make these people fit to be citizens of this country when they are released from their imprisonment. [Applause.]

A letter from the Department of Justice with regard to the bill referred to as identical with this section is printed herewith:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 28, 1940.

Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This acknowledges your oral request for my views concerning a bill (H. R. 8853) to prohibit the transportation of prison-made goods in interstate and foreign commerce.

The bill under consideration would make it a criminal offense to transport in interstate or foreign commerce any goods, wares, or merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined, wholly or in part, by convicts or prisoners, except those on parole or probation. The penalty for violations of the act is to be fixed at imprisonment for a term not exceeding 1 year or a fine not exceeding $1,000, or both. The bill contains a provision that it shall not apply to goods manufactured in Federal penal and correctional institutions for use by the Federal Government. In view of the last-mentioned limitation the bill would not directly affect any activities of the Department of Justice, but would be restricted in its effect to the products of State institutions.

In view of the foregoing considerations, the pending measure involves questions of legislative policy, concerning which I prefer not to make any suggestions, beyond calling attention to the following circumstances, which you may desire to weigh in connection with reaching a final conclusion as to the merits of the bill.

By the Hawes-Cooper Act (act of January 19, 1929; 45 Stat. 1084) it was provided that convict-made goods, except those produced in Federal institutions for use by the Federal Government, transported into any State and remaining therein, should upon arrival and delivery in such State become subject to the operation and effect of its laws, as though they had been manufactured in such State, and should not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced in the original package or otherwise. By its terms this act became effective as of January 19, 1929. Its objective was to subject to State prohibitions against the sale of convict-made goods all such goods introduced from other States.

By the Ashurst-Sumners Act (act of July 24, 1935; 49 Stat. 494; U. S. C., title 49, sec. 61) it was made a criminal offense knowingly to transport convict-made goods from one State or from any foreign country into any State for the purpose of receiving, possessing, selling, or using such goods in violation of the laws of such State. Again, the products of Federal institutions were excepted. Thus the Ashurst-Sumners Act implemented State restrictions against the sale of convict-made goods by prohibiting the importation of such goods into any State forbidding their sale or use. Violations of the act were made punishable by a criminal penalty.

The bill under consideration would carry existing legislation a step further by placing a ban on transportation in interstate or foreign commerce of any convict-made goods, again excepting products of Federal institutions.

This bill may prove detrimental to the best interests of some of the smaller States, which are unable to absorb all of the products of their prisons. I am informed that several States have met this problem by entering into agreements for the exchange of prison-made goods. This, for example, is true of Utah, Wyoming, and Nebraska, the first of which produces canned goods, the second blankets, and the third automobile tags. I am also informed that State prisons of Tennessee sell automobile tags to the State of Mississippi, while certain articles of clothing produced in Alabama institutions are sold to the States of Tennessee and South Carolina for use in their public institutions. I suggest that consideration should be given to the effect that the pending legislation would have on such transactions between State governments. In addition, the necessity of affording useful employment to prisoners as a rehabilitating measure should not be overlooked.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT H. JACKSON,
Attorney General.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am utilizing this time to read to the House a short editorial published in the Cleveland Plain-Dealer of April 24, 1940, entitled "Those Who Need It Most":

THOSE WHO NEED IT MOST

The Federal wage-hour law recognizes, as must all thoughtful citizens, that wages below the level of decent subsistence hurt everyone.

They bring privation, often semistarvation, to their recipients. They hurt business because extremely low-paid workers are out of the market for most of the products of manufacturing industry and the distributive trades. They hurt the farmer because families struggling to exist on a grossly inadequate income cannot even buy enough food.

This latter point is well expressed by Secretary Wallace of the Department of Agriculture in opposing pending amendments to the Wage and Hour Act, which would exempt 1,500,000 workers, including processors of agricultural products.

This group includes many of the most depressed of America's working population. Those who attended the Catholic social workers' convention in Cleveland last year have not forgotten the dramatic appeal which a Texas bishop made on behalf of the pecan shellers, a group of workers which would be exempted by the pending amendments. The churchman warned his audience not to misunderstand him when he talked about a $1.29 wage: "I do not mean $1.29 an hour, or $1.29 a day. I mean $1.29 a week!"

No one has argued that the wage-hour law, in its present form, is an ideal measure. It is capable of improvement. But to change it to exclude those who stand in the greatest need of its protection would be short-sighted public policy and rank inhumanity.

There is no lobby here of small children who work for from 4 to 10 cents an hour, children of 8, 10, and 12 years of age. There is no lobby here of pecan shellers and men and women of that type who are going to be exempted under this law. We ought to be extending the law to include all groups in the country, and not exempt anyone. They have not the money to come here and lobby. The only recreation they get is the privilege, perhaps, of an opportunity to visit the public park on a Sunday. The Master said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." It seems the only friends the victims of child labor have is organized labor. They are on record against these amendments.

How any red-blooded man in this Congress can vote for the Barden amendments is beyond my conception. I can visualize the children in the Southland and elsewhere, I can visualize the children in the sweatshops of New York and elsewhere, in the needle trades, and in the thousands of tenements and shacks where "home work" for a few cents a day is carried on, in States where they have no minimum-wage or maximum-hour laws. Do you want to continue this slavery?

We should not only keep the standard of $12 as a minimum but in due time an intelligent Congress should, and I am sure will, bring it up to a proper increased standard after the highest amount per hour is reached under the present act.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEENEY. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. If the gentleman will read the amendment that was inserted in the bill to the Barden amendment, he will find that the amendment provides that the Barden amendment will not apply to wages and that the minimum-wage requirements shall remain in the bill.

Mr. SWEENEY. That is an adroit way of circumventing the law to provide longer hours. I am for hour regulation as well as wage regulation, I will say to my distinguished friend from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment I inserted to fix a minimum of 30 cents an hour?

Mr. SWEENEY. No; I am not opposed to that if it protects the $12 per week, but it ought to be standard throughout the country. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose not of engaging necessarily in a political controversy, but I am here for the purpose of accepting the challenge of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], when he invited my party to go to the polls this fall on the issue of the existing labor legislation. I do not know that I have the right to accept this challenge for my party, but I have the right to accept it for myself, and I am going to admit there have been some abuses in the administration of the labor statutes that we have enacted; but, aside from that, I am not afraid to confront the people of this country on a platform built on the Wagner Labor Relations Act and the Wage and Hour Act because this is the first effort of a great political party to raise the standard of living and provide decent working conditions for labor in this country. [Applause.]

I can recall prior to this legislation when coal miners in my district, and when coal miners in many States of the Union, were loading coal at the shameful rate of 15 or 20 cents per ton, and soon after the legislation was enacted they were being paid from 50 cents to 65 cents per ton—starvation wages before and reasonable wages afterward—with which the coal operators were able to operate in my district and make a profit on their operations.

So I accept the challenge of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], because that situation was not confined to my district alone.

There are some thirty or forty thousand people engaged in the coal industry, but there are about 40,000,000 in this country who make their living by toil, and every one of them ought to be happy to support the Democratic Party in the coming election because of the legislation it has enacted during this administration. Prior to this administration all over America infant children were being made helpless victims of sweatshop methods, just as though we had not progressed beyond the slavery of the Dark Ages. In many places in this great Christian Republic able-bodied men were being paid starvation wages and subjected to unbearable working and living conditions, and yet my friend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] throws down the gauntlet and challenges the Democratic Party to the battle front at the ballot box upon that issue. I cheerfully accept his challenge and am perfectly willing to submit to the electorate of my country the issue, and when the gentleman from Michigan and his party hear from the 40,000,000 people of America that work for their support at the next election, he will be submerged beneath a mountain of ballots of those who are still unwilling to go back to the dark and distressful days of 1932 and 1933, when the clouds of despair and disappointment hung over our country like a nightmare. I am afraid that if my good friend the gentleman from Michigan goes to the country on that issue he may find himself at home, to his own disappointment and even to my regret from a personal viewpoint, for he is a likeable fellow and I am very fond of him.

I am not averse to some amendments to the legislation that may be necessary, particularly with reference to its administration. There have been abuses, and all abuses ought to be corrected, but I believe the Democratic Party, if it is let alone, will correct them, and I do not believe in sabotaging a statute that is only 4 years old before you have a reasonable opportunity to give it a trial, and for this reason, so far as I am concerned, I accept the challenge of the gentleman from Michigan and will go to the polls on the issue this fall. [Applause.] Let us not repeal labor's Magna Carta of liberty by such proceedings as we are here considering. The law is only 4 years old and has not had a fair test, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall vote against both the Barden and the Norton amendments. In a few days we will probably be again called upon to consider amendments to the Wagner Act, another new statute not yet fairly tested.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat, I accept the challenge of the gentleman from Michigan. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN].

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, I am proud of the fact, when I noticed the result of the recent vote on the Schafer amendment, which was defeated, that I am a Republican, because there were not more than five Members at the most on the Democratic side of the House who supported that particular amendment. I was much pleased to see my good friend the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE] among those five; also the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN. I want the gentleman to know that I supported it.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania voted for it.

Mr. DUNN. I am glad to have the opportunity to support such an amendment.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. These gentlemen are correct. I am glad they voted for the principles of the American market for the American farmer and laboring man. I repeat further that when you Members went through the tellers on the "no" vote on the Schafer amendment there was not a Republican voting against that fundamental principle, and who will deny that fact? When I think, for example, of the approximately 300,000,000 pounds of Asiatic starches brought into this country duty-free, competing with the farmers of the Nation, starches which could have been manufactured in our Nation, manufactured instead by peon labor, mostly in Asia, earning from 12½ cents to 25 cents a day, I consider it ridiculous that this House would not go on record as opposing that kind of competition, not only detrimental to the American farmer, but also to the American workingman.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Yes.

Mr. DINGELL. The gentleman mentioned starches. Does the gentleman know that they came in under the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. If the gentleman has anything constructive to add to my protest on this vote, I shall be glad to hear from him further. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SACKS].

Mr. SACKS. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the Barden bill because I feel that it is an attempt to sabotage the Fair Labor Standards Act. Labor has been under the domination of privileged groups for at least 12 years under the governmental control of Republican policies. Under Franklin D. Roosevelt and the liberal Democratic Party labor was able to demand and receive consideration at the hands of their Government. The wage and hour law, the creation of the Democratic Party, was passed and placed upon the statute books, with the support of the Democratic administration. Today an attempt is being made to remove from our laws these beneficial measures. It is the duty of the liberal Democrats to oppose this vicious attempt. America needs consideration for the underpaid and underprivileged. Industry must realize that unless labor is given an opportunity to raise its standard of living, the products of their industry will not be distributed and their profits curtailed. Common sense should decree the necessity for protection to labor. Democracy to survive requires more consideration for the great masses. Their earning must be preserved. Let us not forget that legislation must be formulated not alone to protect the investments of capital but to protect also the rights of labor.

Therefore, to continue our progress toward unification of capital and labor and more harmonious existence among the great masses, let us defeat the Barden bill and go forward with the wage and hour bill as it now exists. Defeat the reactionary attempt to destroy labor's magna carta, the wage and hour law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER] for 3 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I am on record as being in favor of the Barden bill, but if this amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] fails to carry, I am forced to serve notice on the House at this time that I shall have to vote against the Barden bill. I think I can also state that every Member from Minnesota, as well as from our adjoining States out there, will have to vote against the Barden bill if this amendment of the gentleman from Texas does not carry, because it will impose a great hardship and additional financial burden on many of the farmers of our districts if this amendment to section 12 of the wage-hour law is not taken out. In Minnesota we have a prison factory manufacturing and distributing binder twine and farm machinery, which is very important to the farmers of the Northwest. If this law is allowed to pass, a farmer having bought farm implements from our factories will be unable to even buy replacements or repair parts, and that affects not only Minnesota farmers but also farmers from the Dakotas, Iowa, Wisconsin, and other adjoining States.

By the way, who is it that is interested in the insertion of this particular section in this bill? As the gentleman from Texas has so aptly said, it has no place in this bill. There is no justification for inserting any such clause into this wage-hour bill at this time. Who is it that is interested in it? I call attention to the fact that all the goods made in all the prisons in the United States and which go into competition with the product of private industry amounts to only about one-twentieth of 1 percent of the Nation's total.

I wish I had time to read several extracts from a book that I have here, the Federal Trade Commission Report of the Agricultural Implement Machinery Industry, of date June 6, 1938, in which page after page is taken up with evidence, with testimony, with proof, indicating that it is the International Harvester Co. and the Harvester Trust that is back of this movement. I think after the committee gets into the House I shall ask permission to insert some of these paragraphs that I have here as a part of my remarks. They stand here as a public record showing how the International Harvester Co. and the Harvester Trust and those allied groups or companies putting out farm machinery and binder twine have sought for years to buy, to control, and to otherwise influence the State Legislature of the State of Minnesota, and I do not doubt they have gone into other States in similar manner. I hope the Sumners amendment will be agreed to and that this monopoly-backed section will be stricken out because it is not in the interest of anyone but the greedy and self-serving, and we have had too much of that in America already. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

The question occurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further amendments to section 12?

Are there any amendments to section 13?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, in section 13, I would like to ask unanimous consent to change the figures "1939", line 6, to "1940."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now occurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] to the so-called Byrns amendment to the Norton bill.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOOD. If the Barden substitute is voted down, then the Ramspeck bill will be in order, will it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Barden substitute, so-called, is now before the committee for a vote.

Mr. WOOD. And if it is not accepted, then the next in order will be the Ramspeck bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Then the vote will occur upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], which is the so-called Ramspeck bill.

Mr. WOOD. And if that amendment is voted down, then the next in order will be the committee amendment to the original bill, H. R. 5435?

The CHAIRMAN. Then will be the committee substitute for the bill H. R. 5435.

Mr. WOOD. And if that is voted down, then it would revert to a consideration of the original bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCORMACK. If the Barden substitute is adopted to the Byrns substitute, that means that the Byrns substitute will not be open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. And if the Byrns substitute is adopted with the Barden amendment, then the committee substitute will not be open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. And, in turn, if that is adopted, it means that the Norton bill itself will not be open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN) there were ayes 66 and noes 156.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now occurs upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the so-called Ramspeck bill.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment to H. R. 5435: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That section 5 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(e) No industry committee appointed under subsection (a) of this section shall have any power to recommend the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to any employees in Puerto Rico or in the Virgin Islands. Notwithstanding any other provision of this act, the Administrator may appoint a special industry committee to recommend the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to all employees in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, or in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce, or the Administrator may appoint separate industry committees to recommend the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to employees therein engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce in particular industries. An industry committee appointed under this subsection shall be composed of residents of such island or islands where the employees with respect to whom such committee was appointed are employed and residents of the United States outside of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. In determining the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid, and in determining classifications, such industry committees and the Administrator shall be subject to the provisions of section 8 and no such committee shall recommend, nor shall the Administrator approve, a minimum wage rate which will give any industry in Puerto Rico or in the Virgin Islands a competitive advantage over any industry in the United States outside of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.'

"(b) No wage orders issued by the Administrator prior to the enactment of this act pursuant to section 8 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 shall after such enactment be applicable with respect to any employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands.

"SEC. 2. Section 6 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(c) The provisions of paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (a) of this section shall be superseded in the case of any employee in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce only for so long as and insofar as such employee is covered by a wage order issued by the Administrator pursuant to the recommendations of a special industry committee appointed pursuant to section 5 (e).'

"SEC. 3. Section 7 (c) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended to read as follows:

"'(c) No employer shall be deemed to have violated subsection (a) by employing any employee for a workweek in excess of that specified in such subsection without paying the compensation for overtime employment prescribed therein if such employee is so employed in connection with the—

"'(1) making of dairy products (except ice-cream mix, ice cream, malted milk, and processed cheese), including, among other things, the cooling, pasteurizing, printing, or packing thereof;

"'(2) compressing or storing of cotton;

"'(3) processing of sugar beets, sugar-beet molasses, sugarcane, or maple sap into sugar, molasses, or sirup, but not the refining of sugar;

"'(4) extracting (but not fermenting or refining) oils, juices, or sirups from domestic fruits, vegetables, nuts, or seeds;

"'(5) preparing, cleaning, grading, packing, drying, refrigerating, freezing, preserving, peeling, shelling, storing, or canning fresh or dried fruits and vegetables, but not when those operations are performed at a terminal establishment;

"'(6) preparing, cleaning, grading, packing, roasting, crushing, shelling, or storing nuts, shelled or unshelled, but not when those operations are performed at a terminal establishment;

"'(7) preparing, curing, grading, or bagging raw grease wool, mohair, or rabbit fur;

"'(8) handling, grading, loading, slaughtering, or dressing livestock;

"'(9) handling, storing, grading, slaughtering, refrigerating, picking, dressing, or packing poultry, but not when those operations are performed at a terminal establishment;

"'(10) handling, storing, grading, candling, freezing, drying, or packing of eggs, but not when those operations are performed at a terminal establishment;

"'(11) hatching, handling, or boxing chicks, poults, ducklings, goslings, or wild fowl;

"'(12) handling, grading, cleaning, polishing, handpicking, hulling, delinting, fumigating, drying, packing, or storing of whole seeds, beans, peas, or grains, but not when those operations are performed at a terminal establishment;

"'(13) handling, drying, baling, grinding, decorticating, or packing hops, fiber crops, or forage crops;

"'(14) preparing honey;

"'(15) handling, grading, or packing nursery or horticultural stock; or

"'(16) the felling of trees, logging, or operations incidental to the felling of trees or logging performed prior to, and including, delivery of the logs to a mill for sawing, making pulp, or other processing;

and if such employee receives compensation for employment in excess of 60 hours in any workweek at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed. In the case of an employer engaged in any of the operations specified in paragraphs (1) to (16), inclusive, of this subsection, the provisions of subsection (a), during a period or periods of not more than 14 workweeks in the aggregate in any calendar year, shall not apply to his employees in any place of employment where he is so engaged. As used in this subsection, the term "terminal establishment" means an establishment which (1) is located either in the urban area where the products are to be consumed or at transportation centers for the purpose of servicing consumer markets, (2) receives the major portion of its goods from other establishments at which such goods have been previously concentrated or prepared, and (3) distributes its goods to wholesalers, retailers, consumers, or manufacturers.'

"SEC. 4. (a) The heading of section 11 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: '; Rules and regulations.'

"(b) Section 11 of such act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(d) The Administrator shall have power to make, issue, amend, and rescind such regulations and orders as are necessary or appropriate to carry out any of the provisions of this act. Without limiting the generality of the foregoing, such regulations and orders may define terms used in this act, make special provision with respect to, including the restriction of, and the piece rates to be paid for, home work subject to this act to the extent necessary to safeguard the minimum standards provided in this act or in any regulation or order issued pursuant thereto, and make special provision for voluntary constant wage plans consistent with the purposes of section 7. The regulations and orders of the Administrator shall be published in the Federal Register and shall be effective upon publication or at such later date as the Administrator shall direct.

"'(e) No provision of this act imposing any liability or disability shall apply to any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with any regulation or order of the Administrator, notwithstanding that such regulation or order may, after such act or omission, be amended or rescinded or be determined by judicial authority to be invalid for any reason.'

"SEC. 5. (a) Section 13 (a) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by striking out all of clause (1) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: '(1) any employee employed in a bona fide executive, administrative, professional, or local retailing capacity, or in the capacity of outside salesman, or any employee employed at a guaranteed monthly salary of $200 or more; or.'

"(b) Section 13 (a) of such act is further amended by striking out clause (10) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: '(10) any employee employed in the ginning of cotton; or (11) any switchboard operator, during any calendar year, employed in a public telephone exchange which at all times during the preceding calendar year had less than 500 stations; or (12) any employee employed in the cleaning, packing, grading, or preparing fresh fruits and fresh vegetables in their raw or natural state when such operations are performed immediately off the farm; or (13) any employee employed in handling, tying, drying, stripping, grading, redrying, fermenting, stemming, or packing, when those operations are performed prior to storage, and storing leaf tobacco.'

"SEC. 6. Section 13 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: '; or (3) any employee of an employer subject to the provisions of part I of the Railway Labor Act.'

"SEC. 7. (a) The heading of section 14 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: '; Home work in rural areas.'

"(b) Section 14 of such act is amended (1) by inserting '(a)' after 'SEC. 14.'; (2) by striking out 'learners, of apprentices, and of messengers employed exclusively in delivering letters and messages' and inserting in lieu thereof 'learners and of apprentices'; and (3) by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: 'The Administrator may by regulation or order provide for the employment of telegraph messengers engaged primarily in the delivery of letters and messages at such wages (but not less than 25 cents per hour) lower than the minimum wage applicable under section 6 as will prevent curtailment of opportunities for such employment with a public telegraph carrier.'

"(c) Section 14 of such act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(b) The Administrator shall promulgate regulations permitting the employment, in rural areas, of employees in the home at such wages lower than the minimum wage applicable under section 6, and containing such provisions governing the piece rate to be paid, the time of day during which such work shall be performed, and such other provisions, as the Administrator may prescribe. No such regulation shall be promulgated with respect to any employees (1) if in the opinion of the Administrator the application of section 6 to such employees does not have the effect of curtailing the opportunities of such employees for employment; (2) if the promulgation of such regulation would in the opinion of the Administrator have the effect of curtailing employment in the factories or industrial establishments, if any, in which similar work is performed; or (3) if the promulgation of such regulation would in the opinion of the Administrator give the employer or employers of such employees a substantial competitive advantage.'

"SEC. 8. Section 15 (a) (1) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by striking out the first semicolon therein and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: 'or issued to carry out any provision of section 6 or section 7, except that no provision of this act shall impose any liability upon any person for violating any of the provisions of this section if such person, in a proceeding brought to impose such liability, establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that at the time he acquired a property interest in the goods transported, offered for transportation, shipped, delivered, or sold, or sold with knowledge that shipment or delivery or sale thereof in commerce was intended, he had no knowledge or reason to believe that such goods were produced in violation of any of the provisions of section 6 or section 7, or in violation of any regulation or order of the Administrator issued under section 14, or issued to carry out any provision of section 6 or section 7; and.'

"SEC. 9. Section 15 (a) (2) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(2) to violate any of the provisions of section 6 or section 7, or any of the provisions of any regulation or order of the Administrator issued under section 14, or any of the provisions contained, pursuant to section 8 (f), in any order of the Administrator issued under section 8, or any of the provisions of any regulation or order of the Administrator issued to carry out any provision of section 6 or section 7.'

"SEC. 10. The first sentence of section 16 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended to read as follows: 'Any employer who violates any provision of section 6 or section 7, or any provision prescribing minimum wages or minimum piece rates contained in any regulation or order of the Administrator issued under section 14, or any provision prescribing minimum piece rates contained in any regulation or order of the Administrator issued under section 11 (d), shall be liable to the employee or employees affected in the amount of their unpaid minimum compensation, or their unpaid minimum overtime compensation, as the case may be, and in an additional equal amount as liquidated damages.'

"SEC. 11. Section 17 (including the heading thereof) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'INJUNCTION PROCEEDINGS

"'SEC. 17. The district courts of the United States, including the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and the United States courts of the Territories and possessions, shall have jurisdiction, for cause shown, and subject to the provisions of section 17 (relating to notice to opposite party) of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes", approved October 15, 1914, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 28, sec. 381), to restrain violations of section 15. Any such action may be brought in the district wherein the defendant is found or is an inhabitant or transacts business, and process in such cases may be served in any other district of which the defendant is an inhabitant or wherever the defendant may be found. No costs shall be assessed against the Administrator in any proceeding under this act.'

"SEC. 12. The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'PROHIBITION AGAINST INTERSTATE TRANSPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS

"'SEC. 20. In order to protect the minimum wage and maximum hours standards prescribed in sections 6 and 7, it shall be unlawful for any person knowingly to transport or cause to be transported, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, or aid or assist in obtaining transportation for or in transporting any goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined wholly or in part by convicts or prisoners (except convicts or prisoners on parole or probation), or in any penal or reformatory institution, from one State, Territory, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country, into any State, Territory, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous but subject to the jurisdiction thereof. Nothing herein shall apply to commodities manufactured in Federal penal and correctional institutions for use by the Federal Government. Any person who violates the provisions of this section shall be subject to the penalties provided by section 16 (a). The provisions of this section shall not be deemed to repeal or supersede any other act relating to the transportation or sale of goods made by convicts or prisoners.'"

Mr. McCORMACK (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the committee amendment be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to take this opportunity to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Labor as to whether or not it is expected to complete this bill tonight or whether the Committee will rise and take it up later?

Mrs. NORTON. I will say that as soon as the first paragraph is read the Committee will move to rise. We could not possibly be expected to finish the bill tonight.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I have no objection, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, as I understand it, the committee amendment will be open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that portion of the bill which is in italics is a substitute offered by the committee for the original Norton bill and is considered as one amendment. Any portion of it is subject to amendment if the further reading of the bill is dispensed with and it is placed in the RECORD at this point.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BUCK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, are committee amendments to be considered first?

The CHAIRMAN. Any amendment offered by members of the Labor Committee, of course, will be in order first; and members of the committee offering them will be recognized by the Chair.

Mr. BUCK. The Chair is aware that the gentleman from California has filed an amendment to the first section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is perfectly aware of that and will be happy to recognize the gentleman when it is appropriate to do so.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if it is the purpose to take the bill up for amendment section by section, just as we did the Barden bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot answer that, because that is a situation under the control of the House.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, it is the intention of the committee to take the bill up section by section, exactly as the Barden bill was considered.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Massachusetts modify his request to include the provision that the committee substitute may be considered for amendment section by section?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to modifying my request as indicated by the gentleman from Mississippi, and ask unanimous consent that my request be considered as so modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with, it to be printed in the RECORD at the point offered, and that it may be considered for amendment section by section. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RAYBURN, having resumed the chair, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5435) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, had come to no resolution thereon.

FARM-TENANCY PROGRAM

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following letter from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 30, 1940.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: My attention has been called to an apparent disagreement between the House and Senate conferees with respect to the farm tenancy program under title I of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, for which I included in the annual Budget for 1941 an estimate in the sum of $25,000,000.

I am anxious that provision for this program be made in the Department of Agriculture Appropriation Act for 1941, which is now in the final stages of congressional action. I wish, therefore, to advise that if, in view of the many pressing budgetary needs for 1941, the Congress feels this item might better be financed through a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation than by means of the direct appropriation proposed in the Budget, I would have no objection to the adoption of the loan plan, provided the language of the bill making provisions for the loan by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has the approval of Administrator Jones.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARREN. Is the Chair in position to state at this time what the program will be for tomorrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. We will continue further consideration of the Wage and Hour Act amendments until completed.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Has business in order on Calendar Wednesday been dispensed with?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a communication from one of my constituents.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks and to include therein an article from the Boston Post entitled "Million Hit in Proposed Barden Bill."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHAEL J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks and to include therein an editorial from the New York World-Telegram.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein quotations from the New York World-Telegram.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short editorial.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRANT]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include two short newspaper articles.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. COSTELLO]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous special order, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] is recognized for 30 minutes.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS BILL

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, according to an announcement made this morning by the floor leader, we will have before us for consideration on Thursday the report of the conference committee on the agricultural appropriation bill.

One of the items which we must act upon is the Senate amendment providing an appropriation of $212,000,000 for parity payments to the farmers of this Nation, and I want to make this advance appeal to you Members who are interested in the welfare of the farmers to be here tomorrow and aid us in securing approval of that amendment. The $212,000,000 will not give the farmers what they are entitled to, that is, parity prices for their crops, but it will be a help in that direction and is certainly the very least they should expect.

You will recall that when this bill was first before the House a few weeks ago I had an amendment providing an appropriation of $600,000,000 for parity payments, but I was unable to get enough Members of the House to go along to secure the adoption of that amendment. It should have been adopted; that amount should be appropriated for two reasons:

First, it requires that amount to give farmers 100-percent parity prices for the five basic commodities—cotton, corn, wheat, rice, and tobacco—and the Congress has promised the farmers parity prices for these crops at the earliest possible moment. That is what I understood, and that is what the producers of these five commodities understood when Congress asked them to carry on their farming operations under the control provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938. In that act Congress said—and in section 303 of that act Congress provided as follows:

> It is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress to assist farmers to obtain parity prices for such commodities and parity of income.

> If, and when, appropriations are made therefor, the Secretary is authorized and directed to make payments to producers of corn, wheat, cotton, rice, or tobacco in amounts which, together with the proceeds thereof, will provide a return to such producers which is as nearly equal to parity price as the funds so made available will permit.

The second reason I drew my amendment for $600,000,000 was because the best authorities in the Department of Agriculture estimate that the manufacturers' protective tariff, now in force, is costing the farmers of the Nation at least $600,000,000 each year. As this extra burden has been placed on the backs of the farmers, for the special benefit and protection of industry, I certainly think that it is only fair that the Congress, which in 1930 passed that tariff act, should cancel or relieve that burden on the farmers by providing for them special benefits or parity payments in an equal amount. The farmers ask only equality of treatment. That they have the right to demand, and no member of this House who undertakes to represent them and speak for them should be willing to accept anything less than equality.

Unfortunately, due to the peculiar legislative situation and the consideration which this bill has already received, it is now impossible to amend the bill so as to increase the amount, and we are forced to accept what we can get, that is, the $212,000,000, which is the same amount appropriated for parity payments for 1939 and 1940.

Why do you hesitate, gentlemen, about approving this $212,000,000? Would you go back on your promise to the 32,000,000 farmers of this Nation? Are you not familiar with the economic condition of the farmers today? Have you forgotten what you have done for business and industry and many other groups? Do you realize that every time you helped these other groups you were adding to the farmer's burden and increasing his cost of the necessities he must buy? Do you think it is fair to try to balance the Budget, which we all want to do, at the sole expense of the farmer? Since you voted for billions for the Army and Navy and national defense, have you forgotten that the proper defense of this Nation also includes proper provision and protection for those millions of patriotic and liberty-loving Americans who must produce the food and fiber to feed and equip the Army, the Navy, the Air Corps, and 100,000,000 other citizens?

Is it possible that you do not understand what parity prices mean? Let me try to explain it to you. In the Agricultural Adjustment Act Congress defined "parity price" as being "that price for the commodity which will give to the commodity a purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy equivalent to the purchasing power of such commodity in the period from August 1909 to July 1914" and "parity income" as being "that net income of individuals on farms from farming operations that bears to the net income of individuals not on farms the same relation as prevailed during the period from August 1909 to July 1914."

After long investigation it was found that the period from August 1909 to July 1914 was a fair or parity period. That is, the income of the farmers and the income of people not on the farm was fair and on a basis of equality. Also, that the farmers' products had a fair purchasing power—that is, that a pound of cotton or a bushel of wheat or a bushel of corn could be exchanged for a proper or fair amount of nails, or shoes, or clothing, or other things the farmer had to buy. In other words, that during those years, 1909 to 1914, on the average the price the farmer received for what he sold and the price he paid for what he bought was on a parity, on a fair basis. And to give the farmer a parity price today means to give him that price for his cotton, corn, wheat, and other products, as will buy the same amount of goods which the same products could buy during the period 1909 to 1914.

Is the farmer receiving that kind of price for his products today? He most certainly is not. One of the best ways to show what has happened to the farmers is to refer to the 1913 catalog and the 1940 catalog of one of the large mail-order houses, as their prices are the same in all parts of the country. What do we find? Work shirts could be ordered from the 1913 catalog for an average price of 57 cents. The average price in the 1940 catalog is 73 cents, or an increase of 28 percent. At January 15 prices in 1913 it took 4.7 pounds of cotton to buy a work shirt. The cost now is 7.2 pounds of cotton, or 53 percent more than in 1913. The cost of bib overalls has increased 39 percent in price, and in cotton from 5.8 to 9.6 pounds, or 66 percent.

Common nails have not changed much since 1913, the same old nail, and used for the same purposes, but the price has gone up 74 percent. In 1913 it took 31 pounds of hogs to buy 100 pounds of eightpenny nails, but in January of this year it took 70 pounds of hogs to buy the same amount of nails, an increase of 126 percent.

Neither has there been much change in the ax during these 27 years, but in 1913 it required 1.2 bushels of wheat to buy a 4-pound ax, while in January of this year it required 2.2 bushels. In 1913 you could buy a long-handled, round-point shovel for 48 cents. The cheapest shovel of this type which you find in the catalog is 79 cents, an increase of 65 percent.

These are just a few samples. On page after page in the two catalogs you will find the same thing—increased cost to the farmer, without a corresponding increase in the price of his product. Just how long do you think he can continue to keep going under such conditions? Do you say that you have nothing to do with it, that you are not responsible, that the farmer is just the unfortunate victim of circumstances? No such thing. You are partly if not largely responsible. I want to read you this list of 23 laws passed by Congress, every one of which has increased the other fellow's income, or guaranteed him a better price. Here it is, listen:

Act of August 15, 1876 (19 Stat. 200, p. 5; U. S. Code 25:261): Commissioner of Indian Affairs authorized to prescribe prices at which goods are to be sold to Indians.

Act of October 15, 1914 (38 Stat. 730, ch. 323, p. 2): Supplemented Antitrust Act of 1914, prohibiting difference in prices to purchasers to lessen competition, etc.

Act of June 3, 1916 (39 Stat. 213, p. 120; U. S. Code 50:80): Secretary of War authorized to determine prices to be paid for military supplies in time of war.

Act of September 7, 1916 (39 Stat. 735, p. 18; U. S. Code 46:817): Shipping Board (i. e., Maritime Commission, at present) authorized to prescribe just and reasonable rates, fares, and charges of common carriers by water in interstate commerce.

Act of August 10, 1917 (40 Stat. 281, 284–286): Fixed guaranteed prices of wheat; authorized President to fix price of coal and coke during period of war.

Act of October 6, 1917 (40 Stat. 421 (c)): President authorized to fix prices of articles necessary for conduct of war, produced under license to use processes, etc., owned or controlled by an enemy or ally of an enemy.

Act of February 28, 1920 (41 Stat. 483–487; U. S. Code 49:6, 15): Interstate Commerce Commission authorized to fix charges, etc., of common carriers in interstate commerce, etc. (Amended by act of March 4, 1927, 44 Stat. 1447, p. 2.)

Act of June 10, 1920 (41 Stat. 1073, pp. 19, 20; U. S. Code 16:812, 813): Federal Power Commission authorized to regulate charges of licensees under Federal Power Act, if no State commission has such regulatory power.

Act of August 15, 1921 (42 Stat. 166–167; U. S. Code 7:212): Secretary of Agriculture authorized to prescribe charges, etc., of stockyard owners or market agencies in certain cases.

Act of September 21, 1922 (42 Stat. 1000, p. 5 (c, d)): Authorized Secretary of Agriculture to designate as "contract markets," governing boards which prevent misleading reports or manipulation of prices of grain in interstate commerce.

Act of June 25, 1926 (44 Stat. 769, ch. 674): Provided that owners of potash rights agree to market the potash produced, at a reasonable price.

Act of May 18, 1933 (48 Stat. 65, p. 12; U. S. Code 16:831k): Tennessee Valley Authority to fix schedule of resale prices in contracts for sale of surplus electric power.

Act of June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1072, p. 205; U. S. Code 47:205): Federal Communications Commission authorized to prescribe charges for communication by wire or radio or transmission of energy.

Act of June 6, 1934 (48 Stat. 889, p. 9) (Securities and Exchange Act of 1934): Prohibited manipulation of security prices.

Act of August 14, 1935 (49 Stat. 649, ch. 532; U. S. Code Supp. 7:218c): Act of August 15, 1921, above, made applicable to live-poultry dealers and handlers.

Act of June 30, 1936 (49 Stat. 2036, ch. 881, 2039, p. 6; U. S. Code Supp. 41:35, 40): Secretary of Labor to determine minimum wages to be paid by Government contractors.

Act of April 26, 1937 (50 Stat. 77–81; U. S. Code Supp. 15:833): National Bituminous Coal Commission authorized to prescribe maximum and minimum coal prices for code members.

Act of June 3, 1937 (50 Stat. 247 (f); U. S. Code Supp. 7:608c): Secretary of Agriculture authorized to fix prices for milk.

Act of August 17, 1937 (50 Stat. 693, VIII): Amended antitrust laws relating to contracts in restraint of trade by providing that contracts prescribing minimum prices which are lawful in intrastate transactions are not to be rendered illegal in the resale of such commodity at the minimum price elsewhere.

Act of September 1, 1937 (50 Stat. 904, p. 201) (Sugar Act of 1937): Provided for regulation of sugar prices to consumers.

Act of June 21, 1938 (52 Stat. 822–824; U. S. Code Supp. 15:717c, 717d): Federal Power Commission authorized to fix charges of natural-gas companies.

Act of June 23, 1938 (52 Stat. 955, p. 5; U. S. Code Supp. 46:1131): Maritime Commission authorized to prescribe minimum-wage scales in contracts under Merchant Marine Act. Same (p. 964, p. 43; U. S. Code Supp. 46:845a): Maritime Commission authorized to prescribe rates, etc., of carriers subject to Intercoastal Shipping Act.

Act of June 25, 1938 (52 Stat. 1064, p. 8; U. S. Code Supp. 29:208): Administrator of Wage and Hour Division authorized to fix minimum wages.

Surely you know that when you throw protection around the other fellow, increase the price he can charge, guarantee him a minimum price, or regulate his rates or charges upward, you are at the same time increasing the cost to the farmers, increasing his burden that much, and reducing the purchasing power of his crops to that extent. Congress is partly responsible for the inequality borne by the farmers, and it should immediately do justice and either guarantee them a parity price or compensate them for the extra burden placed on them.

I realize that the farmers are not well organized, as they should be, and that they cannot come here and make their demands like some of these other organized pressure groups, but I have the idea that the farmers of this Nation are doing a lot of thinking and figuring these days, and if the unfair burdens they bear are not soon lifted and the inequalities visited upon them are not soon corrected, they will rise up and strike down many Congressmen who profess to represent them today.

How long do you think organized labor would submit to such treatment? While the farmer is being denied a parity price for his crops, let us see what the organized worker has been doing. Here is a table prepared by the Department of Agriculture showing what has happened to factory workers and those employed in the building and construction trades since 1913. Listen to it:

Weekly earnings in building and construction, and of factory workers, 1913, 1919, and 1939

Now compare that with the figures from the following table, which shows the price the farmer was receiving in March 1940, for his products and the parity price he should be receiving in order to be on an equality with other groups and in order for his products to have a fair or parity purchasing power. Here it is:

[1] Prices not available. [2] Adjusted for seasonality.

Let us analyze these two tables a minute. For example, let us see what has happened to the carpenters during the last 27 years. In 1913 he was paid on the average of 51 cents an hour, was working about 45 hours per week, and was earning $23.07 per week. At the same time the farmer was receiving 12.4 cents for cotton, 64.2 cents per bushel for corn, 4.8 cents per pound or $96 per ton for peanuts, and 7.22 cents per pound for hogs.

Now, let us see the situation today: On June 1, 1939—and there has been no reduction in wages since then—the same carpenter was receiving $1.40 per hour, nearly three times as much as in 1913; he was working only 38.7 hours per week, and his average weekly earnings were $54.22. But you will notice that on the basis of parity—that is, on what his salary will buy today as compared with what it bought during the period 1909–14, his salary would be only $32.87. That is, the carpenter is receiving nearly twice the parity wage. That is all right—I am glad to see him get it.

But—what has happened to the farmer in the meantime? This table shows that his average price for cotton from 1909 to 1914 was 12.4 cents per pound. Also that due to the increase in cost of the things he must buy he should now get 15.87 cents per pound, the parity price, in order for a pound of cotton today to buy the same things which it bought in 1913. But, instead of getting nearly twice the parity price, as is the carpenter, the cotton farmer in March of this year was receiving only 10 cents per pound for his cotton, or only 63 percent of the parity price. In other words, the farmer must struggle along with a 63-cent dollar for his work while others receive from 100 to 200 percent of parity. And, mind you, the farm program has reduced the farmer's cotton production; he has less bales to sell; and even if he should get the parity price for his cotton today he would still be far short of parity income. To bring him up to a parity income, he would have to produce and sell at the parity price—15.87 cents per pound—the same amount of cotton which he produced and sold in the period from 1909 to 1914.

The same is true of other crops. Corn should be bringing 82.2 cents per bushel, while in March it was selling for 56 cents. Peanuts should bring 6.1 cents per pound, while they sell for 3.6 cents. Hogs should bring $9.24 per hundred pounds but sell for only $4.87.

The farmer does not object to the wage earner, the factory worker, or others receiving a better wage. Certainly I do not. We want them to live a better life, to have a better standard of living, to enjoy more comforts, and give their children a better education and better advantages. We want them to have more and better food. We realize that when the industrial worker makes more money he can buy more farm products. But we do feel that it is unfair, that it is unjust, that it is unequal, that it is wrong for the Congress to pick out selected groups, legislate them into improved conditions, and in doing so increase the cost of manufacturing or processing the necessities which the farmer must buy, increase the farmer's cost of living, and not at the same time make adequate provision for the farmer and help him bear the increased burden. These wage earners, these factory and industrial workers do not ask or expect preferred treatment over the farmer. They seek the privilege of a good standard of living, and I believe they want the farmers of this Nation to enjoy the same privilege. The farmer also wants to live decently, to enjoy some of the comforts and pleasures of life, to give his children a good education and decent clothing; he, too, wants to save something for rainy days and old age. He has the same impulses of affection for his loved ones as any other citizens; he has the same pride in his home, in his good name, in his credit. And he is entitled to the same treatment.

That is what parity means. It means equal treatment. It means keeping the price of farm products on the same general level with other costs. It means keeping the farmer on the same plane with other groups. It means justice, fairness, equality—nothing more, nothing less.

It is estimated that the present population of the United States is 130,000,000, and of these, 32,059,000 are living on the 6,920,000 farms in this Nation. You will see that exactly one-fourth of our people live on the farm. Well, you will agree that they are as good as any other citizens, will you not? That they are entitled to the same comforts, pleasures, rights, privileges, and income as any other American? You agree to that statement? All right; let us see what this one-fourth of our people who live on the farm receive. In 1939—last year—they received only 6.6 percent of the total national income. Can you believe it? Here are the figures for the last 30 years:

[1] National income available for living. For method of derivation see The Agricultural Situation, May 1, 1937, p. 19.
[2] Preliminary estimates.

You will notice that 30 years ago, in 1909, the total national income was $26,415,000,000, and of that the farmers received $4,345,000,000, or 16.4 percent; while last year, in 1939, the national income had increased two and one-half times, or to $67,608,000,000; but the farmers' part of it had not increased in the same proportion. The farmers' national cash income had practically stood still, being only $4,458,000,000, or 6.6 percent of the total. While the total national income increased 250 percent the farmers' part of it dropped from 16.4 percent to 6.6 percent. Let it be understood that these figures represent the cash farm income, and do not include food and feed consumed on the farm, nor do they include the conservation, benefit, and parity payments made to the farmers during the last several years, which have totaled about $3,000,000,000. But as no one knows how long Congress will continue to appropriate these benefit and parity payments they were not included in these comparative figures.

Do you understand now why there have been hundreds of thousands of farms sold under foreclosure during the last few years? Do you understand why the farm States are financially unable to match Federal funds for old-age assistance? Do you understand why farmers are unable to pay their taxes? Do you understand why the farmer finds it such a hard job to keep his home in repair, to buy necessary farming implements, and to provide his family with the ordinary comforts enjoyed by those who live in the cities? It is because they represent 25 percent of the total population but receive only a little over 6 percent of the total national cash income.

You Members from the great industrial sections can render no greater service to your own people than by joining us in the fight to improve farm prices and to increase the income and buying power of the 32,000,000 people who make their living on the farm. How can the farmers buy your automobiles, your farm implements, your tractors, your radios, your fence wire, and the hundreds of other things which you manufacture, if they do not have the money? The only money they get is what they receive for their crops. If they had received parity prices for their products during the last few years their income would have been increased by $20,000,000,000. Think how many extra men that would have put to work and how much business would have been improved all over the Nation.

Let me say, gentlemen, that in my opinion the best market in the world today is the American farmer. Just give him the income, the buying power, and he will make the wheels of industry hum. Some of those in high places tell us that we must buy sugar from Cuba and the Philippines so that the Cuban and the Filipino will buy American automobiles and tractors. At the same time the farmers of Florida and Louisiana and the Western States have the land and are begging for the right to grow more sugarcane and more sugar beets, and I believe if they were permitted to do this, and the importations of sugar from Cuba and the Philippines were cut down proportionately, that the cane and sugar-beet farmers of the United States would buy more automobiles and tractors and other American products than all the Cubans and Filipinos put together.

The same is true of foreign oils. We are told that we must buy about a billion pounds of coconut and other oils from the Philippines, cottonseed oil from Brazil, peanut oil from Japan, and other oils from other foreign countries so that the people in those countries will buy American automobiles and other manufactured products from us. Well, I believe in being a good neighbor, I believe in international trade when it does not actually hurt us, but I also believe that the American farmer has the first claim on the American market for the sale of his crops. We should first set up and enforce the rule that we will buy from the American farmer as long as he can produce what we need, and exchange with foreign countries for any extra we need and for the things we cannot produce ourselves.

We do not produce, and therefore must buy from abroad, such things as coffee, rubber, silk, tin, tungsten, and many others. Let us buy those things from those countries which will buy our surplus cotton and wheat.

Under the present farm program the cotton farmers of the South have voluntarily reduced their cotton acreage over 12,000,000 acres. That much of our cotton land has been taken out of the production of cotton. Of course, this has reduced the amount of cotton we produce, but at the same time it has greatly reduced the amount of cottonseed, which is crushed into oil. The great majority of our farmers consented to these reductions because they understand that we have an enormous surplus of cotton on hand and realize that this surplus must be substantially reduced to ever get a proper price for cotton. On August 1 of last year we had on hand 14,000,000 bales of cotton. The crop last fall totaled 11,600,000 bales, making a total supply of 25,600,000 bales. From last August 1 to February 1 we had consumed 4,626,000 bales in this country, and up to March 25 we had exported 5,100,000 bales. On this basis it appears now that for the year ending August 1, 1940, we will use in the United States about 7,500,000 bales and will export about 6,500,000 bales, making a total disposed of for the year of about 14,000,000 bales. This will leave us with a carry-over of 11,600,000 bales, exactly what we produced last year, on next August 1, at which time we will start gathering the 1940 crop, which it is now indicated will be about 12,000,000 bales. Therefore you will see that on next August 1 we will have in the warehouses and in the fields a total supply of 23,600,000 bales of cotton.

This would indicate that our farmers may want to continue to reduce their cotton acreage for several more years, and the point I am making is that while the farmers are making this sacrifice, reducing their cotton acreage, and thereby greatly reducing the supply of cottonseed oil, you Members from the great hog- and lard-producing States and you Members from the great dairy States should not only be glad to vote for these appropriations for parity and benefit payments but the Congress should protect the cotton farmers against the unfair competition of oils produced in foreign countries. Yet every month thousands and thousands of pounds of cottonseed oil, crushed from cottonseeds grown with cheap labor in Brazil, are unloaded at the port of Savannah, Ga., practically in sight of our own cotton fields.

You understand, I suppose, that cottonseed oil, peanut oil, lard, butter, soybean oil, coconut oil, and other similar oils are all directly competitive and mostly interchangeable. It is the total of all of these that go to make up our total supply of oils and fats or vegetable oils, and each directly influences the price of the other. This Nation is not producing any more oils and fats than we need and consume, but this billion pounds shipped in here each year from the Philippines tax-free creates a surplus and is sufficient to break the market and keep down the price. Last year, in talking with the present United States Commissioner to the Philippines, I raised strenuous objections to this Philippine oil entering our country. His reply was:

> Why, Mr. PACE, we could not afford to stop the importation of that oil. Think of the bad effect it would have on the economic welfare of the Filipinos.

I told him then, and I tell you now, that when it comes to an issue of the welfare of the cotton, peanut, and hog farmers of this Nation and the welfare of the Filipino, I intend to try to protect my own people. These foreign oils are costing our farmers untold millions of dollars each year. For instance, here is a news item which I clipped from a newspaper day before yesterday:

> MEMPHIS, TENN., April 27.—The National Cotton Council predicted today "disastrously low" cottonseed prices this fall "unless powerful measures are taken to forestall a glutted domestic fats and oil market."

But I did not mean to get off on this foreign-oil question, for I get mad every time I think about it. I was asking you to vote for this appropriation of $212,000,000 for parity payments.

I have heard some of you refer to these parity payments as being just a subsidy. I do not think it is, and I do not look at it that way. I regard it as merely an equalization fund, to which the farmer is entitled under every principle of justice, fairness, and equality. But, for the sake of the argument, let us say it is a subsidy. What of it? Certainly the farmer would not be the first or the only one receiving a subsidy.

What do you call the protective tariff, if it is not a subsidy? It is estimated to cost the American people over $3,000,000,000 each year, and every dollar of that money is going into the pockets of the manufacturers and businessmen whose products are protected. And, as I stated a few minutes ago, the farmers' part of that extra burden, that subsidy to the manufacturer, is $600,000,000 each year.

The Government pays approximately $8,000,000 each year in subsidies to the Air Mail Service, to save them from losses.

You have voted a subsidy of between thirty and forty million a year to the ocean-steamship lines to help them along.

It costs the Government around $50,000,000 each year to operate and maintain the airports and airfields, for the use of private citizens and companies.

The annual expenditures and interest on public investments for rivers and harbors for the use of private business is over $100,000,000.

Federal and State expenditures for the construction and maintenance of roads is over $1,000,000,000 each year.

Most of the railroads of the Nation were constructed through the help of large grants of cash or land.

You appropriate over $80,000,000 each year to put into the retirement fund for Government employees.

You appropriate millions and millions every session of Congress to carry on the great social-security program; including unemployment insurance and old-age pensions. The farmers do not get one penny of that.

And I could go on and on. Do not talk to me about a subsidy for the farmer, when you have about subsidized everybody else.

But the greatest subsidy of all is one not paid to the farmers, but paid by the farmers. At this very hour, and for several years past, the farmers have been selling their products at less than it cost to produce them. The farmer has had to take the loss. In doing so he has used up his money, has watched his land go down, worn out his work stock and farm implements, and, in the end, has stood by and seen his home sold to pay a debt he made in order to carry on his farming operations. Yes, it is the farmer who, year after year, has subsidized the balance of the Nation, furnished them with food and fiber for less than the cost of production. The people have no right to ask or expect to buy farm products at less than cost or at cost, and the present system that requires such a thing should be changed and corrected at once.

Mr. Speaker, the two greatest problems facing this Congress and the Nation are farm income and unemployment. These must be solved before we can have any permanent prosperity, and it so happens that the two are closely related and interlocked. In fact, as I see it, there is no hope of putting any considerable portion of the unemployed to work until we have substantially increased the farmer's income and improved conditions on the farm. Why do I say that? Just listen:

The farm population of this Nation has stood still for the last 30 years. Here are the figures:

Farm population, nonfarm population, and number of farms in the United States, Jan. 1, 1910–39 [1]

[1] Population estimates for the years 1911–19 and number-of-farm estimates for all except census years have been rounded to the nearest 10,000.

[2] Preliminary.

You will notice that in 1910, 30 years ago, the farm population was 32,077,000, and that last year it was 32,059,000, or a loss of 18,000 for the 30 years. You will also notice that during the intervening years the farm population has made only small changes back and forth around those figures. But during these 30 years the total population of the United States has increased from 91,417,000 to 130,929,000, or 40 percent, and all the time the number of people who remained on the farm has been the same. That of itself speaks louder than words.

But, in addition, the rate of births has been much greater among the farm population than with the balance of the people. This table shows the difference for the 10 years, 1910 to 1919:

Birth and death rates per 1,000, United States and farm population, and natural increase of the farm population, 1910–19

Year	United States population		Farm population
	Birth rate	Death rate	Birth rate (115 percent of column 2)	Death rate (88 percent of column 3)	Natural increase rate (column 4—column 5)	Excess of births over deaths
(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)	(5)	(6)	(7)
1910	27.5	15.4	31.6	13.6	18.0	580,000
1911	27.6	14.6	31.7	12.8	18.9	610,000
1912	27.6	14.3	31.7	12.6	19.1	620,000
1913	27.5	14.4	31.6	12.7	18.9	610,000
1914	28.1	13.9	32.3	12.2	20.1	650,000
1915	27.8	13.8	32.0	12.1	19.9	650,000
1916	27.6	14.3	31.7	12.6	19.1	620,000
1917	27.3	14.5	31.4	12.8	18.6	600,000
1918	27.1	18.5	31.2	16.3	14.9	470,000
1919	25.1	13.3	28.9	11.7	17.2	540,000
Total						5,950,000

You will notice that for 1919 among all the people, including farmers, there were born each year 25.1 babies to each 1,000 persons, and deaths at the rate of 13.3 per 1,000. But with the farm population alone the birth rate was 28.9 per 1,000 persons, and the death rate was only 11.7 per 1,000. This shows that each year among the farm population there is an average increase of births over deaths of 595,000 persons. As the farm population remains practically the same from year to year, this means that each year an average of 595,000 people leave the farms for the cities.

Why do they leave the farm? Principally for two reasons: First, because living conditions are supposed to be better in the cities, with more comforts and pleasures, and, second, because income on the farm is so low that it offers little promise for the future. This constant drift of around one-half million people from the farms to the cities each year is alone sufficient to bring about an unemployment problem, even if you did not have over 10,000,000 unemployed in the towns and cities.

And the only way you can stop these concentrations of our population in the cities, which in itself is a constant danger to good government, is to make life on the farm more attractive and more profitable, to give the men and women and boys and girls on the farm the same opportunities, the same standards of living, the same promise in the future, the same return for their labor, and the same income as is enjoyed by those who live in our towns and cities.

You will not solve unemployment merely by bringing back prosperity in town or to the great industrial centers. A careful study, going back over a hundred years, shows that, without exception, when you try to create prosperity merely by raising wages in the industrial centers, or improving conditions in the cities, you bring about an immediate rush from farm to city. It will always be that way. It is natural, it is just human, for a person to try to better his condition, and to go to where he thinks he can make the most money. To bring real prosperity, to really solve unemployment, you must increase the farmers' income and make living on the farm worth while.

You are not going to solve unemployment merely by appropriating two or three billion dollars for relief, as you have done each year for the last several years. A W. P. A. worker is paid from 25 cents to a dollar an hour. A cotton farmer must sell his cotton at a price that gives him from 25 cents to a dollar a day, working from daylight to dark. If he can leave the farm, do you blame him for going after the better pay? Of course not. You cannot solve unemployment in the cities in that way. You can get a satisfactory and permanent solution only by making life on the farm worth while and attractive, so that our boys and girls will want to stay there and return there.

Mr. Speaker, I hope no Member will take what I have said to mean that I think this Congress and this administration has not done anything for the farmers and farming conditions. We certainly have, and I am glad that I was given the opportunity to help with much of it. No fair-minded person will, upon reflection, contend that the farmer has been forgotten. I shall never forget the dark days of 1932, when cotton was selling for around 5 cents per pound, wheat for 32 cents, corn for 19 cents, hogs for 2¾ cents, cattle for 3½ cents, and peanuts for $20 per ton.

I repeat and insist that we will not give justice and equality to the farmer until we insure him a parity price for his crops, but I also insist that we have been helpful in many ways. May I mention a few?

We have put a bottom under the price of the five great basic crops—cotton, corn, wheat, rice, and tobacco—through the loan provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. While the bottom may be too low, the farmer who produces any of these five crops now knows that his price will never go below 52 percent, or a little over half, the parity price. For the law provides that when the price starts below that point the Commodity Credit Corporation must—not may—make the farmer a loan of not less than 52 percent nor more than 75 percent of the parity price. But the farmers should have 100-percent parity, not just a part of it.

We have provided cheap money for the farmers for crop loans, at 4-percent interest, through the Emergency Crop Loan and the Production Credit Associations.

We have provided cheap money for farm loans through the Federal land banks, and reduced the interest rate on these loans from 5 and 6 percent to 3½ percent. And just a few days ago we passed in this House a bill keeping this rate on both Federal land bank and Commissioner loans at 3½ percent for at least another 5 years.

Through the Farm Security Administration we have provided funds for the rehabilitation of farmers who have lost everything they had and are worthy of being given another chance.

When farmers are found in destitute condition, or when they have suffered a complete crop failure on account of drought or too much rain or other disaster, as we had in my section last fall, we have provided funds for outright grants to be made to them to keep body and soul together.

We have set up the Surplus Commodity Corporation and provided it with ample funds to buy up and distribute or divert surplus farm crops. This reduces farm surpluses, increases the farmers' price, and at the same time gives help to those in a destitute condition. I have taken a deep and special interest in this surplus commodity fund, for it is from that source that we secure the money with which to operate each year the peanut-diversion program. The 24 counties in my congressional district produce nearly one-fifth of all the peanuts grown in the entire United States. They have become a major crop with us, and, in my opinion, this peanut-diversion program is one of if not the best programs of the Department of Agriculture. It has at times about doubled the market price of peanuts and has meant millions of extra dollars to the farmers of my district. I am now working day and night to get the Department to give us the program again this fall.

We have provided funds—$500,000,000 each year—for what I believe is one of the greatest programs ever set up for the farms and the farmers of the Nation—that is the soil-conservation program. When you go out and see how we have let our lands wash away, down to the rivers and the sea, you must be thankful for a program which teaches a farmer how to save and conserve his soil, encourages him in the best methods, and then pays him cash money as an inducement to keep doing it and for any financial sacrifice he must make in the effort.

Another great program just getting well under way is the farm-tenant purchase program, under which those who are deserving and dependable may borrow money at 3 percent interest, payable in 40 years, and secure something they have never had before, a small farm and home of their own. A large percentage of the farmers in my State are tenants, and I know what this program is going to mean to the man who has looked forward to owning but never had the money to buy a home of his own, something to work for, to love, and to fight for.

And has anything finer ever been done than to give the farmer the blessings and benefits of the rural-electrification program? I mentioned a few minutes ago the job we have of trying to keep the boys and girls on the farms. Well, I believe this program is going to be a great help along that line, for under it the farmer, his good wife, and children may have and enjoy all of the comforts and conveniences which only the city folks have had. I hope this program can be expanded and enlarged until every farmhouse in my district can have electric lights and power.

We have set up a great program for research into new uses and new markets for farm commodities. Some new markets and new uses must be found before we can hope to dispose of some surplus crops or expand our production very much. We are building four great regional laboratories, one in each section of the Nation, and through these the work will be directed.

We have started and provided funds for a farm forestry program to help the farmers reforest their barren lands or put them to other useful purposes. We need this badly in my country.

Two years ago we provided for the insurance of the wheat crop against loss for almost any cause, including rain, drought, freeze, hail, insects, but not for failure to work and cultivate properly. And just last week we amended that law so as to also include insurance on our cotton crops. Under it the farmer will have the same security enjoyed by a businessman who carries insurance; that is, he will know when he plants his crop that he is guaranteed at least 75 percent of his normal production. I hope this proves so successful we can soon extend it to all crops.

We appropriated $130,000,000 for a special or price-adjustment payment for our cotton farmers for 1938, $212,000,000 for parity payments in 1939, $212,000,000 for parity payments for this year, and I am appealing to you now to vote for this amendment so our farmers can know, before they plan and plant their crops next spring, that this money as a step toward parity prices will be on hand for them in 1941.

I could go on and mention other things which we have done and tried to do to be helpful to the farmers, but my time does not permit. What I wanted to show is that anyone is foolish or does not know who would say that the farmer has been forgotten. But I again repeat that we have not done for the farmer what he deserves, or given him equality of treatment until we bring the price of his crops up to the full parity price and have given his cotton, corn, wheat, peanuts, and other crops the same buying power enjoyed by other commodities and groups.

In other words, the present farm program is not the full answer to our farm problem. Then, too, there are some features of it that are not working fairly and should be corrected. I shall mention just one.

A few years back we planted about 40,000,000 acres in cotton. Now, under the control program, we are planting about 27,000,000 acres. That means that the cotton farmers are cooperating to the extent of reducing their cotton acreage over 12,000,000 acres, and thousands of them do not have any other cash crops to plant on that acreage. Of course, when we reduced the production of lint cotton that much we also reduced the production of cottonseed the same amount. As I have already explained, our cottonseed is bought to be crushed into oil, and the price we get for the seed is controlled absolutely and entirely by the price of the oil.

It is very difficult and in many cases impossible for our cotton farmers to make a bare living on the small acreage allotted to them. They must find and produce some other cash crop. Now, you would certainly think that for their idle acres these cotton farmers would have and should be given the first claim on any other crop that produced vegetable oil, in order to make up for their heavy reduction in the production of cottonseed, or else they should receive a better price for the cottonseed they do produce on account of taking that much oil off the market.

Well, it happens that soybeans are also crushed into oil. The oil from soybeans and the oil from cottonseed are almost exactly alike, and are used for the same purposes. While our cotton farmers of the South have been reducing their cotton acreage, let us see what has happened in the Northwest, particularly in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa. In 1929 the farmers in that section were not planting enough soybeans to hardly notice, only about 2,000,000 acres, and the few that were grown were used for hay or plowed under to build the soil. From 1924 to 1933 they produced on an average of only 9,760,000 bushels of soybeans, and of that only 1,942,000 bushels were crushed into oil and only 94,000,000 pounds were made into cake and meal.

But now watch it. In 1934 soybean production jumped to 23,095,000 bushels, of which 9,105,000 bushels were crushed into oil. In 1935 it went to 44,378,000 bushels produced and 25,181,000 bushels crushed. In 1938 up to 62,729,000 bushels produced and 44,470,000 bushels crushed. And last year production climbed to 87,409,000 bushels, and over 60,000,000 bushels were crushed. Last year 9,023,000 acres were planted in soybeans and present reports are that at least 10,610,000 acres are being planted this year.

The Northwest has just about expanded its acreage of soybeans, mostly for soybean oil, up to what the South has taken out of cottonseed. While the cottonseed oil mills in the South were standing idle, or running on half time last fall, they were building new soybean oil mills in the Northwest as fast as trains could bring the machinery. The people around Decatur, Ill., were so happy and prosperous over the situation that their newspaper, the Herald and Review, got out a soybean special edition on December 31, 1939, of 64 pages, showing pictures of all their new soybean mills and storage plants and telling of how soybeans had replaced their reduction in corn and oats.

The oil crushed from soybeans this year is estimated to exceed 500,000,000 pounds. That means that soybean oil has been increased during the last few years to where it amounts to as much or more than the loss in cottonseed oil the cotton farmers have had to take under the cotton-reduction program. That is not right. The farm program should not have that effect; it should not produce any such result. And, worst of all, while this has been going on the cattle, hog, and dairy farmers of the Northwest have been threatening and howling their heads off for fear we would compete with them a little by using some of our idle lands for the raising of cows and hogs and for dairying. You need not take my word for the soybean situation. I read you the following from a statement by an official of the Department of Agriculture and published last month in the Department's pamphlet entitled "The Agricultural Situation":

> The rapid increase in soybean production in the United States during the past 6 years has provided many farmers with a new cash crop, and other farmers with valuable hay, forage, and green-manure crops. On the other hand, the greater soybean production has materially increased the domestic surplus of edible fats and oils, and has been an important factor depressing prices of lard and cottonseed oil. * * *
> In the four States where the greatest increases in soybean acreage have taken place—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa—soybean acreage has tended to take the place of land previously planted to oats and corn. These four States in 1939 accounted for 61 percent of the total soybean acreage and 91 percent of the beans harvested. * * *
>
> The necessity for finding a more profitable crop than oats, and in some cases corn, has been important in bringing about increased soybean production.
> Soybeans grown in this country, when milled, yield about 80 percent of their weight in high-protein cake and meal, useful primarily as a concentrated livestock feed and also for making vegetable glues and plastics. In addition, the domestic soybean yields 14 to 16 percent of its weight in edible oil, which is similar in many respects to cottonseed oil and lard.
>
> During 1939 the crushing capacity of mills located in commercial soybean areas was expanded sharply; it is estimated that such mills are now capable of crushing 80,000,000 bushels of soybeans annually. * * *
>
> Increased production and crushings of soybeans have intensified the problem of making profitable disposition of the growing surplus of food fats and oils produced in this country. Aside from butter, for which production in most years is about equal to consumption requirements, the principal food fats and oils produced in the United States are lard, cottonseed oil, and soybean oil. The chief outlet for cottonseed oil and soybean oil is in manufactured cooking fats; hence these oils compete directly with lard. * * *
> * * * production of cotton seed oil during the next few years is likely to continue 200,000,000 to 300,000,000 pounds smaller than the 1,545,000,000-pound average for the 10 marketing years prior to 1934. The reduction in cottonseed-oil supplies, together with increased domestic requirements resulting from population growth, would about offset the loss in export outlets for lard. However, soybean-oil production in 1940, and in subsequent years, is expected to total well over 500,000,000 pounds compared with an average production of less than 20,000,000 pounds annually during the 10 predrought years.

The farm program should not have this effect between the two sections and it should either be corrected or else the farmers in my State should be permitted to plant unlimited acreage in peanuts and produce without restrictions such hogs, cattle, dairy products, eggs, and other crops as are adapted to our soil and climate.

Peanuts are also an oil-producing crop. In fact, they produce the finest vegetable oil in the world, which can be used for many purposes. While there is some reason to limit the production of peanuts for edible purposes, as that market is very limited, certainly there can be no good reason why the farmers who have taken such severe cuts in cotton acreage should not be permitted to plant that acreage in peanuts for crushing into oil. Nothing else would be fair in view of what is taking place in other sections of the country, and I hope to have such a plan approved before another planting season comes around.

No, we cannot say that the present farm program is perfect, that it is a complete answer to the problems of agriculture. No plan will be the answer unless or until it gives the farmer a full parity price for his full crop, and, in conclusion, I again appeal to you to approve this amendment and help toward a parity price with cash until we can perfect a system that will do it without any calls on the United States Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain tables relating to the subject matter which I have just discussed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE]?

There was no objection.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have had a great many requests for information concerning the probability of taking up the home-loan bank bill, H. R. 6971, this week. Can the Chair give the House any definite information as to whether that bill will be considered this week?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon the completion of the bill that has been under consideration today, and which will be under consideration tomorrow, the conference report on the Agricultural Department appropriation bill will be taken up. That will probably be Thursday. We hope to dispose of that on Thursday and then take up the conference report on the transportation bill, which, of course, will preclude consideration of the so-called home-loan bank bill this week.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 hoping that the act would be fairly and effectively administered. I thought that those in the executive branch of the Government charged with the duty of administering the law would reasonably interpret its provisions according to the true intent and meaning of those of us who were responsible for its enactment, but by administrative interpretation the intention of Congress has been distorted and in some instances completely annihilated.

I was particularly interested in the Biermann amendment, which provided exemptions of industries and employees engaged in processing perishable agricultural commodities. I collaborated with the author of the Biermann amendment, and at my suggestion language was inserted the effect of which we at that time understood would exempt from the provisions of the act tobacco warehousemen and their employees and the employees of tobacco stemmeries and redrying plants. At the time the bill was being considered, in an effort to emphasize the meaning of the language contained in the Biermann amendment, amendments were offered which would have specifically and definitely exempted employees engaged in the businesses to which I have just referred, but upon the assurance of the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill that the language of the Biermann amendment was clear and unambiguous and upon the chairman's statement to the effect that additional amendments were wholly unnecessary, the language then in the bill was accepted and the fight for additional amendments was abandoned. Unfortunately, by administrative interpretation the very definite meaning of the language was distorted by those charged with the duty of fairly interpreting and administering the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Those who were interested in providing an exemption for the industries and employees to which I have referred were not moved by any desire on their part to prevent the payment of fair and just wages to those engaged in handling and redrying leaf tobacco. The exemption was sought, and, in fact, was actually provided, for the reason that those of us who are familiar with the nature of the work, the character of the commodity, and the characteristics of the employees knew that the provisions of the act should not be applicable to this type of processing.

I am sure that no person familiar with cotton farming would employ either a white man or a Negro to pick cotton at a fixed price per hour or per day. I am likewise sure that no person who was free to exercise his own good judgment would employ people to stem tobacco at a fixed price per hour or per day. Some people can pick three or four times as much cotton in a day as others and some employees can and do stem three or four times more pounds of tobacco in a day than do others. A fixed wage per hour would destroy the incentive of those who really want to work. Under such a system, the employee who produced little would receive the same pay as the employee who produced much. Even now those engaged in handling, stemming, and redrying tobacco can earn a wage far in excess of that which is paid to either farm hands or domestics.

In placing an administrative interpretation upon the area-production section of the bill the Administrator has completely destroyed the exemption provided in the bill by Congress.

I was well pleased when I observed that H. R. 5435, the Norton bill, which was reported by the Committee on Labor, specifically and definitely provided exemption from both the wage and hour provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act for employees engaged in handling, drying, stripping, grading, redrying, fermenting, stemming, packing, and storing leaf tobacco.

The Barden bill, H. R. 7133, likewise provides a similar exemption along with many other exemptions, but the Barden bill which was offered as a substitute for the Norton bill was today amended in such a way as to make it objectionable even to its author. By amendment to the Barden bill the wages provisions would still be applicable to those engaged in the businesses to which I have referred. Now that the House has rejected the Barden bill, I hope that the exemption provided in the Norton bill will be retained to the end that the original intention of Congress with respect to this particular exemption may be carried into effect. An attempt to enforce the provisions of the present law upon the businesses I have referred to will result in great loss to both the employers and employees engaged in the first processing of leaf tobacco. Employees will lose their jobs and will be forced upon relief rolls in many of the towns in North Carolina and other tobacco-growing States. I urge you, therefore, to retain the exemption provided in the Norton bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BUCK asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOLAND]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, on April 23, 1940, there was introduced in the House of Representatives House Joint Resolution No. 521, as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing the recognition of American women's interest in aviation and directing their attention to and urging their cooperation with the coming Nation-wide celebrations of National Aviation Day on August 19, 1940, and for other purposes

Whereas the development of aviation, both as an important industrial asset and as a strong arm of our national defense, is vitally essential to the welfare of our country; and

Whereas by Public Resolution No. 14, approved May 11, 1930, at the suggestion of the NATIONAL AVIATION DAY ASSOCIATION, recognized and designated August 19, 1940, the birth date of Orville Wright, as National Aviation Day, and further provided for Nation-wide celebration of that date; and

Whereas the patriotism of American women from the very inception of our Republic has been the inspiration of lovers of liberty, respected and admired the entire world over; and

Whereas today American women have a double interest in the advancement of aviation, first, as a potent means of defending their homes against invaders; second, as an increasingly important industrial factor contributing to the pay rolls, and thus aiding recovery and maintaining prosperity: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in recognition of American women's interest in aviation Congress directs their attention to and urges their cooperation with the coming Nation-wide celebrations of National Aviation Day on August 19, 1940.

Now, Mr. Speaker, April 24, 1940, Mrs. HATTIE W. CARAWAY, senior Senator from the State of Arkansas, introduced the same resolution in the Senate. Therefore I not only wish to call to the attention of the Congress but to the American people the important part that the women of our Nation have played in the remarkable growth of aviation as pilots in flying planes, but most important of their confidence in aviation as a modern means of transportation, thereby helping to increase the safety factor in this fast-growing industry. We in Congress can do our part in the recognition of the success women have contributed in aviation by the passage of these resolutions. [Applause.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. PLUMLEY, for 2 days, on account of official business.

To Mr. MCLAUGHLIN, for 4 days, on account of urgent business.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MAY 1, 1940

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 24, 1940)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Father Almighty, who deckest Thyself with light, shine upon us with Thy radiance, and lead us through the deeps of our own nature into Thy holy presence. On this day so full of associations and hallowed memories, accept the rededication of Thy servant to the life whereunto Thou hast called him. Grant that the words of his mouth and the meditations of his heart may be always acceptable in Thy sight, and may wing their way to the hearts of all the Members of this great company of men upon whom a trusting and expectant Nation has placed a heavy though glorious responsibility.

Bless every Member of the Senate, its officers and helpers, and upon the honored and beloved leader of this body, the Vice President of the United States, we invoke Thine every blessing. Grant to us here, dear Lord, to treasure the great moments of our lives, when to our eyes are revealed the infinite sanctities of life, in which our hearts are sustained in their tasks and comported in their sorrow by the mystic touch of eternal love; and in these regnant sunlit hours enable us to steer our bark through the troubled waters and under frowning skies to the long-sought harbor, the waiting heart of God. We ask it for the sake of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day of Tuesday, April 30, 1940, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9007) making appropriations for the Department of Labor, the Federal Security Agency, and related independent agencies, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. TARVER, Mr. HOUSTON, Mr. SHEPPARD, Mr. HARE, Mr. ENGEL, and Mr. KEEFE were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

CALL OF THE ROLL

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is a member of the Board of Visitors to the United States Naval Academy and is therefore necessarily absent.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that my colleague the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

THE CHAPLAIN OF THE SENATE

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate at this time to a happy coincidence of dates.

I doubt whether the Senate of the United States or any other legislative body has ever had a more devoted, charming, gracious, God-fearing, and almost Godlike chaplain than the Senate of the United States has had for a number of years.

Today marks the sixty-fifth anniversary of the birth of Dr. Phillips, the Chaplain of this body. It also marks the fortieth anniversary of his ordination into the ministry of the Episcopal Church, he having been ordained at the age of 25, and having since that time devoted himself, his great talents, his great energy, and his great conceptions of human life and human destiny to the ministry which is his chosen profession.

I am glad to call attention to this happy occasion and to extend a word of greeting and congratulation to Dr. Phillips upon his marvelous career, and upon the deep and abiding impression which he has made upon all who know him and who have come in contact with him.

In one of his orations Bob Ingersoll stated that "Life is a narrow vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities." I do not subscribe to that definition of life. I do not believe that the past out of which we have come is a cold or barren peak, nor do I believe that the future toward which we are headed is a cold or barren peak. It is a source of consolation and of joy and of inspiration that there are in the world men who are willing to devote themselves not to the accumulation of wealth, not necessarily to the pursuit of fame, but who are willing to act as pilots to their fellow men as they travel out of the past, through the present, into the future.

I am sure I speak the sentiments of every Member of the Senate when I congratulate Dr. Phillips not only upon his accomplishments as a minister, not only upon his idealism as a citizen, not only upon his example—which we may all emulate with pleasure and with profit—but I congratulate him upon the fact that while his treasures and his rewards may not be measured in acres and in bank accounts, though I would wish that they were adequate, they may be found in the service he has rendered not only to the Senate, not only to his church, but to mankind in general. I am sure we all wish him an extension of years and renewed opportunities for the great service which has characterized his entire life.

DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR FURNIFOLD M'L. SIMMONS

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I rise to announce to the Senate the death on yesterday of the Honorable Furnifold McLendel Simmons, who served his country in the Senate with great intelligence, industry, capacity, and fidelity to duty throughout 30 consecutive years. Prior to his service in the Senate he served with distinction one term in the House of Representatives.

Measured by every standard, Senator Simmons will take his place for generations to come as one of the greater figures in the life of our Commonwealth. He will be remembered here as a Senator who in all respects proved himself in a long and lofty career worthy of his great trust.

Mr. President, I ask in connection with this announcement to have published in the RECORD a brief sketch of the life of Senator Simmons, taken from the New York Times of this date.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The article is as follows:

[From the New York Times of Wednesday, May 1, 1940]

SIMMONS, SENATOR FOR 30 YEARS, DIES

NEW BERN, N. C., April 30—Former Senator Furnifold McLendel Simmons, who represented North Carolina in the Senate for 30 years, a longer time than any other North Carolinian, and who headed the important Senate Finance Committee during the Wilson administration, died this afternoon at the home of a daughter, Mrs. Wade Meadows, near this city, at the age of 86. He had been in failing health for years.

Surviving, besides Mrs. Meadows, are a son, James H. Simmons, of Jones County, and two other daughters, Mrs. L. A. Mahler, of Raleigh, and Mrs. J. F. Patterson, of New Bern.

Mr. Simmons was born in Jones County, N. C., on January 20, 1854. He attended Wake Forest College and Trinity College (later Duke University), being graduated from Trinity in 1873. Two years later he was admitted to the bar.

In 1886 Mr. Simmons was elected to the Fiftieth Congress, from the Second North Carolina District, and at the expiration of that term returned to the practice of law. During the second administration of President Grover Cleveland, he was collector of internal revenue for the eastern district of North Carolina.

In 1894 the Democrats of his State turned to him for help. He was then practicing law at New Bern. He was chosen chairman of the State committee, and built an organization which won a striking victory in the 1898 campaign. This returned the State government to Democratic control after its rout because of the strong sweep of the Populist movement in 1894, which had swept Republicans into office, many of them Negroes.

Mr. Simmons waged the State campaigns of 1898 and 1900 in a militant manner.

HIS RECORD IN THE SENATE

Mr. Simmons was sent to the Senate for the first of his five consecutive terms in 1901. As chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, which he headed from 1913 to 1919, Senator Simmons was coauthor with Oscar W. Underwood, then chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, of the tariff act bearing their names. He also sponsored the various revenue measures to finance the participation of the United States in the World War.

What he regarded as among his noteworthy achievements in the Senate was his work in behalf of good roads. In 1912 he offered an amendment to the post-office bill seeking an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the improvement of roads used in the rural delivery of mail, the communities benefited to pay half the cost. After a hard fight in committee, he obtained a compromise appropriation of $500,000 as an experiment. Three years later he had the satisfaction of witnessing the appropriation of $85,000,000 for the same purpose on the principle he had formulated.

In 1875 Senator Simmons married Miss Eliza Hill Humphrey. They had three children. Mrs. Simmons died in 1883, and on July 29, 1886, the Senator married Miss Belle Gibbs, who died in 1938. Two children were born of his second marriage.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8913) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. TYDINGS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. TYDINGS, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. OVERTON, Mr. TRUMAN, Mr. HALE, and Mr. BRIDGES conferees on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the petition of David A. Munro, editor of Space and Time, Washington, D. C., praying that the $88,829 appropriation to the Federal Trade Commission contained in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1941, for a study of the methods and costs of distribution, pertaining especially to advertising, be rescinded by joint resolution of the Congress, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from James A. Tallman, president, Fifty-first Iowa Infantry Association of Southern California, Costa Mesa, Calif., praying for the enactment of the bill (H. R. 289) for the relief of officers and soldiers of the volunteer service of the United States mustered into service for the War with Spain and who were held in service in the Philippine Islands after the ratification of the treaty of peace, April 11, 1899, on reconsideration, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of Knickerbocker Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of New York City, N. Y., favoring the issuance of a commemorative postage stamp in honor of Mary Ball Washington, mother of Washington, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a resolution of the Democratic Women's Luncheon Club of Baltimore, Md., protesting against the entry of tropically refined sugar into the United States and also a reduction of the quantity of imported cane sugar refined in this country, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Rev. Msgr. S. Wachowiak, pastor of Holy Rosary Parish, and John A. Dewicki, president of the Polish American Council, both of Baltimore, Md., and sundry Polish organizations, clergymen, and citizens, all in the State of Maryland, praying for the enactment of legislation granting an appropriation for the relief of the distressed people of Poland, suffering as a result of the twofold invasion of that devastated country, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BILBO (for himself and Mr. HARRISON) presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Mississippi, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to appropriate sufficient Federal funds to make possible the furnishing of electric power from the Tennessee Valley Authority to Lauderdale, Clarke, and Wayne Counties

Whereas the Tennessee Valley Authority has extended its power lines to the county lines of Kemper and Winston Counties and is now furnishing electricity to those counties; and

Whereas the Mississippi Power Co. has lines which can easily be connected with the transmission lines of the T. V. A. at DeKalb, Miss.; and

Whereas the counties of Lauderdale, Clarke, and Wayne are extremely desirous of receiving the power generated by the T. V. A.: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein), That Congress be, and it is hereby, memorialized to make possible the extension of T. V. A. power to the counties of Lauderdale, Clarke, and Wayne and to provide sufficient funds for such purpose; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Mississippi delegation in Congress by the clerk of the house.

Mr. BILBO also (for himself and Mr. HARRISON) presented the following concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of Mississippi, which were ordered to lie on the table:

Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to pass the Wagner-George bill appropriating $10,000,000 for construction of hospitals in rural and economically depressed areas

Whereas there has been introduced in the Senate of the United States Congress the Wagner-George bill, to appropriate $10,000,000 for construction of hospitals in rural and economically depressed areas; and

Whereas there is a real need for small hospitals in southern rural areas to provide medical and clinical assistance to those who cannot afford expensive hospitalization in cities; and

Whereas, even though economy in government is desirable, such economy should not be effected by depriving those least able to pay of necessary hospital facilities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein), That Congress be memorialized to pass the Wagner-George bill, appropriating $10,000,000 for the construction of small hospitals in rural and economically depressed areas; be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of the house of representatives be directed to send copies of this concurrent resolution to Senators WAGNER and GEORGE and to our Mississippi Congressmen.

Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to pass Senate bill 231 and House bill 299, authorizing the acquisition of forest lands adjacent to and over which highways, roads, or trails are constructed or to be constructed, wholly or partially with Federal funds, in order to preserve or restore their natural beauty

Whereas the natural beauty along Federal and State highways is being destroyed by billboards advertising various products, unsightly fences, and underbrush; and

Whereas there are no parkways contiguous to most Federal and State highways that are open to the traveling public; and

Whereas the purpose of Senate bill No. 231 and House bill No. 299 is to preserve, restore, improve, and protect the natural beauty along highways and roads: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to pass Senate bill 231 and House bill 299, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to each Mississippi Congressman.

PARITY PAYMENTS TO FARMERS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a petition I have received from a large group of farmers of Ellsworth, Kans., and vicinity, urging that Congress provide permanent funds for parity payments, and which I now present for proper reference. I think the petition states the position of our farmers on this matter so well that it is worth placing in the RECORD.

The petition reads as follows:

We, the undersigned farmers and citizens of Ellsworth County, Kans., earnestly petition you to urge Congress to enact some permanent legislation for funds to give us farmers full parity payments on our base production of wheat. We farmers have cooperated with the agricultural-conservation program almost 100 percent year after year, with the hope that Congress would do the right thing by providing funds by some sort of processing tax. For 7 years we have patiently waited for Congress to give us parity prices on wheat. So far it has been nothing but appropriations. Either give us something worth while or else tear down the high-tariff wall that has favored the industries for some 100 years. They have no right to special privileges under our democracy.

Signed by R. L. Boggs, of Ellsworth, and 68 others.

Mr. President, these farmers in Ellsworth County know what they are talking about. They have, as stated in their petition, cooperated almost 100 percent with the conservation program year after year. They are largely wheat growers. They know that the A. A. A. of 1938 authorized Congress to provide parity payments to make up the difference between prevailing market and parity prices on their base acreage production; but they have not received parity prices for wheat. Neither have they received parity payments from the Government sufficient to make up the difference between market price and parity price. In fact, it is a question today whether they will receive any parity payments at all for the 1941 crop year. Congress, having approved the principle of parity payments, should make provision for making these payments, and a permanent method of financing them, either by processing taxes, the income-certificate plan, or some other method that will make the program to that extent self-sustaining.

The American farmers do not want to be kept in business by gratuities from the Federal Treasury. When we proposed the McNary-Haugen plan 15 years ago it was to have been financed by the equalization fee, which amounted to a processing tax. I may say at this time that ultimately we probably are going to have to return to the basic principle of the McNary-Haugen bills, the two-price system on wheat and other major surplus crops. Under this program farmers will be guaranteed a domestic parity or cost-of-production price for the proportion of their production required for domestic consumption, and take what they can get on the exportable surplus.

But that is not the problem immediately before us. The financing of parity payments, I believe, is before the Congress, and will be before the next Congress.

Conferees last week sent to the House for action a bill carrying approximately $1,000,000,000 for agriculture. I say when it is necessary for Congress to appropriate a billion dollars or more a year from the Federal Treasury for agriculture, that is a pretty certain sign that the farmer is not prosperous.

The Secretary of Agriculture says that farm income has averaged between $1,500,000,000 and $2,000,000,000 a year short of parity income for the past decade. The American Farm Bureau says parity payments should be $700,000,000 a year, instead of the $200,000,000 voted by the Senate; and it is not even certain that the House will stand for that much.

The present administration has had 7 years to solve the farm problem. I have supported its proposals, because to me there is no political partisanship involved where the American farmer is concerned; and what have we got?

Well, the 7 years of the New Deal have brought us to this point: When we appropriate a billion dollars a year for farm subsidies and administration of the farm program, farm income still is a billion dollars a year short of farm parity.

I say these farmers of Ellsworth County, Kans., have a right to ask that Congress do something more realistic and more helpful that it has done to date. If we are to continue under the present program, the parity payments authorized as part of the program should be made; and the farmers are right in insisting that if parity payments are to be made, they should be financed on a permanent basis.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the petition presented by the Senator from Kansas will be received and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

SUFFRAGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I desire also to call attention to two resolutions adopted recently by the District of Columbia Congress of Parents and Teachers, which now has a membership in the National Capital of more than 18,000 men and women who are deeply and sincerely interested in the welfare of the District as the home of themselves and their children.

I may say that in the past there has not been unanimity of opinion in this city-wide organization on the matter of suffrage for the District of Columbia and having the District represented in Congress; but within the past few weeks the Congress of Parents and Teachers, through its board of managers, has gone on record for both local and national suffrage for the District. That has been my own position for years. I say the people of the District of Columbia are American citizens. They pay taxes. They are liable for military duty. They are keenly alive to the problems of government, well informed, and keenly interested. I say they are entitled to representation in Congress and also they are entitled to the right of local self-government, the same as other American citizens and communities.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, resolutions adopted by this organization on March 12 and April 9, 1940, copies of which were furnished me by Mrs. Nora M. Lowe, president of the District of Columbia Congress of Parents and Teachers.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The following resolution was passed by the board of managers of the District of Columbia Congress of Parents and Teachers, in regular session assembled, Tuesday, March 12, 1940:

"Resolved, That the board of managers of the District of Columbia Congress of Parents and Teachers approves and endorses an amendment to the Federal Constitution to provide for the following:

"1. The Congress of the United States shall have power to provide for the people of the District of Columbia representation to the Congress and among the electors of President and Vice President no greater than that of the people of the States, and that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to controversies to which citizens of such district shall be parties the same as to controversies to which citizens of a State shall be parties.

"2. And it is further resolved, That copies of this resolution, after having been spread upon the minutes of this meeting, be sent to all the local associations of this Congress for their action thereon."

Mrs. C. D. LOWE, President.

The following resolution was passed by the board of managers of the District of Columbia Congress of Parents and Teachers, in regular session assembled, Tuesday, April 9, 1940:

"1. Resolved, That the board of managers of the District of Columbia Congress of Parents and Teachers approves and endorses such legislative action as may be necessary by the Congress of the United States to provide by local suffrage the right of the people of the District of Columbia to have and to administer its own government.

"2. That all legislation hereunder shall be subject to amendment or repeal.

"Resolved further, That copies of this resolution, after having been spread upon the minutes of this meeting, be sent to all local associations of this Congress for their action thereon."

Mrs. C. D. LOWE, President.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. DANAHER, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6618) to provide for the registration of trade-marks used in commerce, to carry out the provisions of certain international conventions, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1562) thereon.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3727) limiting the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code and section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States with respect to certain counsel, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1563) thereon.

Mr. TOBEY, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3161) for the relief of the estate and minor children of Dale W. and Gladys M. Guise, Sally C. Guise, and Martha G. and Arnold E. Orner, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1564) thereon.

Mr. MEAD, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1827) to allow moving expenses to employees in the Railway Mail Service, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1566) thereon.

Mr. HAYDEN, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8745) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1567) thereon.

Mr. HUGHES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7019) to amend section 1 of the act providing punishment for the killing or assaulting of Federal officers, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1568) thereon.

IMPORTATION OF ARTICLES FOR NEW YORK AND SAN FRANCISCO WORLD'S FAIRS

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to submit a report and then to present a request for unanimous consent.

From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 431) to extend to the 1940 New York World's Fair and the 1940 Golden Gate International Exposition the provisions according privileges under certain customs and other laws to the expositions of 1939, and I submit a report (No. 1565) thereon.

Mr. President, the joint resolution, which has already been passed by the other House, merely extends the act heretofore passed for the benefit of the 1939 expositions at New York and San Francisco to the expositions now being conducted in those cities during the year 1940.

I ask unanimous consent that the report be received and that the joint resolution be immediately considered. As I have said, it is reported from the Committee on Finance without amendment, and I have stated the single and sole purpose. Inasmuch as the present law has expired in one case already, it is highly proper and desirable that the joint resolution should be passed now for the protection of the Treasury Department and of those interested in the two expositions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report submitted by the Senator from Georgia will be received. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 431) to extend to the 1940 New York World's Fair and the 1940 Golden Gate International Exposition the provisions according privileges under certain customs and other laws to the expositions of 1939, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on April 30, 1940, that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 199) amending Public Resolution No. 112 of the Seventy-fifth Congress and Public Resolution No. 48 of the Seventy-sixth Congress.

BILLS INTRODUCED

By Mr. TYDINGS:

S. 3905 (by request). A bill relating to the admission to St. Elizabeths Hospital of persons resident or domiciled in the Virgin Islands of the United States; to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

PROHIBITION OF FOREIGN SILVER PURCHASES—AMENDMENT OF GOLD RESERVE ACT OF 1934

Mr. KING submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 785) to repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, to provide for the sale of silver, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

NOTICES OF MOTIONS TO SUSPEND THE RULE—AMENDMENTS TO INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted the following notice in writing:

In accordance with rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that it is my intention to move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 8745) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, the following amendment, namely:

Under the Bureau of Indian Affairs, General Support and Administration, in the paragraph entitled "Wisconsin: Keshena", strike out the figure "$72,100" and insert "$78,100", and at the end of the paragraph, insert the following preceding the semicolon:

": Provided, That for the fiscal year 1939 and thereafter not to exceed $6,000 shall be available annually from the funds of the Menominee Indians for the payment of salaries and expenses of the chairman, secretary, and interpreters of the Menominee General Council and members of the Menominee Advisory Council and tribal delegates when engaged on business of the tribe at rates to be determined by the Menominee General Council and approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8745, the Interior Department appropriation bill, 1941, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

(For text of amendment referred to, see the foregoing notice.)

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also submitted the following notice in writing:

In accordance with rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that it is my intention to move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 8745) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, the following amendment, namely:

At the proper place, under the caption "Annuities and Per Capita Payments," Bureau of Indian Affairs, insert the following:

"The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to withdraw immediately from the Treasury of the United States $105,000 of any funds on deposit to the credit of the Menominee Indians in Wisconsin, and to expend said sum, or as much thereof as may be necessary, for a per capita payment of $50 to each enrolled member of the Menominee Tribe: Provided, That such payment shall be in lieu of the payments authorized by the act of June 15, 1934 (48 Stat. 964), for the fair market stumpage value of timber cut on the Menominee Reservation during the fiscal years 1940 and 1941: Provided further, That the amounts expended for making such per capita payment shall be reimbursed to the tribal funds utilized therefor from sums that would otherwise be paid said Indians pursuant to the act of June 15, 1934, supra."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8745, the Interior Department appropriation bill, 1941, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

(For text of amendment referred to, see the foregoing notice.)

Mr. HAYDEN, in accordance with rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, submitted notices in writing of motions to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to House bill 8745, the Interior Department appropriation bill, 1941, the following amendments:

At the proper place in the bill insert the following:

"WAR MINERALS RELIEF COMMISSION

"Administrative expenses: For administrative expenses made necessary by section 5 of the act entitled 'An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes,' approved March 2, 1919 (40 Stat. 1272), including personal services, without regard to the civil-service laws and regulations; traveling and subsistence expenses; supplies and all other expenses incident to the proper prosecution of this work, both in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $11,200: Provided, That any claim that has not been prosecuted and disposed of prior to July 1, 1941, shall not thereafter be considered by the Secretary of the Interior and shall be barred."

At the proper place in the bill under the caption "United States High Commissioner to the Philippine Islands," insert the following: ", of which amount not exceeding $10,000 shall be available for expenditure in the discretion of the High Commissioner for maintenance of his household and such other purposes as he may deem proper: Provided, That the salary of the legal adviser and the financial expert shall not exceed the annual rate of $10,000 and $9,000 each, respectively: Provided further, That section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (41 U. S. C. 5), shall not apply to any purchase or service rendered under this appropriation when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed the sum of $100."

On page 25, after the word "Provided", in line 3, insert the following: "That in addition to the amount herein appropriated the Secretary of the Interior may also incur obligations, and enter into contracts for the acquisition of additional land, not exceeding a total of $325,000, and his action in so doing shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment of the cost thereof, and appropriations hereafter made for the acquisition of land pursuant to the authorization contained in the act of June 18, 1934, shall be available for the purposes of discharging the obligation or obligations so created: Provided further,"; and in line 4, after the word "appropriated", insert the following: "or of this contract authorization."

On page 69, line 8, after the sum "$400,000", insert the following: ", and in addition thereto the Secretary of the Interior may incur obligations and enter into a contract or contracts not exceeding the total amount of $895,000, and his action in so doing shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment of the cost thereof, and appropriations hereafter made for continuing construction of the project shall be available for the purpose of discharging the obligation or obligations so created."

On page 82, line 5, after the sum "$200,000", insert the following: ": Provided, That expenditures from this appropriation and from any other appropriation for the construction of the Modoc Unit shall be reimbursed from net revenues hereafter received from the lease of grazing and farming lands within the Tule Lake Division, notwithstanding the provisions of subsection I of section 4 of the act of December 5, 1924 (43 Stat. 703; 43 U. S. C. 373a)."

On page 89, after line 6, insert a new paragraph reading as follows:

"It is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress that, in the opening to entry of newly irrigated public lands, preference shall be given to families who have no other means of earning a livelihood, or who have been compelled to abandon, through no fault of their own, other farms in the United States, and with respect to whom it appears after careful study, in the case of each such family, that there is a probability that such family will be able to earn a livelihood on such irrigated lands."

On page 104, after line 12, insert a new paragraph reading as follows:

"Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, Royd R. Sayers, a commissioned officer on the active list, United States Public Health Service, is authorized to hold the office of Director of the Bureau of Mines in the Department of the Interior without loss of or prejudice to his status as a commissioned officer on the active list of the United States Public Health Service and if appointed to such civil office he shall receive in lieu of his pay and allowances as such commissioned officer the salary prescribed by law for such civil office."

On page 119, in line 9, after "1941", insert a new paragraph reading as follows: "Provided further, That in addition to the amount herein appropriated the Secretary of the Interior may also approve projects, incur obligations, and enter into contracts for additional work not exceeding a total of $3,000,000, and his action in so doing shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment of the cost thereof and appropriations hereafter made for the construction, reconstruction, and improvement of roads and trails shall be considered available for the purpose of discharging the obligation so created"; and in line 10, after the word "appropriation", insert the following: "or contract authorization."

On page 120, line 3, after the word "purpose", insert the following: ": Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall make a detailed statement of expenditures from this appropriation to the Senate and House Committees on Appropriations at the beginning of the next regular session of Congress: Provided further, That in addition to the amount herein appropriated the Secretary of the Interior may also approve projects, incur obligations, and enter into contracts for additional work not exceeding a total of $6,000,000, of which $2,100,000 shall be for the Natchez Trace Parkway and shall be allotted and expended ratably between the States of Mississippi, Alabama, and Tennessee according to mileage of said parkway in each respective State, and his action in so doing shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment of the cost thereof, and appropriations hereafter made for the construction and maintenance of the Blue Ridge and Natchez Trace Parkways shall be considered available for the purpose of discharging the obligation so created."

On page 143, after line 20, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Division of Territories and Island Possessions: For expenses of the Division of Territories and Island Possessions in the investigation and survey of natural resources of the land and sea areas of the Antarctic regions, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, or by contract, if deemed necessary, without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, rent, traveling expenses, purchase of necessary books, documents, newspapers and periodicals, stationery, hire of automobiles, purchase of equipment, supplies and provisions, and all other necessary expenses, $250,000: Provided, That fuel, repairs, and emergency supplies to be paid for out of this appropriation may be contracted for in foreign ports."

Mr. HAYDEN also submitted sundry amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8745, the Interior Department appropriation bill, 1941, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

(For text of the amendments referred to, see the foregoing matter.)

PROHIBITION OF FOREIGN SILVER PURCHASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 785) to repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, to provide for the sale of silver, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah obtained the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that the Senator from Utah intends to discuss certain phases of the pending legislation. I have asked him to yield to me so that I may offer an amendment. I do this because I desire that the amendment may be before the Senator, who desires to discuss it.

I send the amendment to the desk and ask to have it stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, line 20, it is proposed to strike out all of section 1 and to substitute therefor the following:

Section 3 of the act approved June 17, 1934, at 9 p. m., being an act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes," being Public, No. 438, Seventy-third Congress, is amended by adding a further proviso at the end of such section 3 to read as follows: "And provided further, That hereafter no silver shall be purchased abroad or of the production of a foreign country unless it be agreed and arranged so that the purchase price of such silver shall be applied solely in the purchase and payment for agricultural exports from the United States of agricultural products of the United States in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to limit the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire and make payment for foreign silver purchased and contracted for prior to the date of the enactment of this act."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me for a moment further?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. The amendment I am offering is an amendment to the pending amendment, of course. It would strike out all of section 1 and substitute what I have offered. In effect, it provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may not purchase any more foreign silver unless it is agreed and arranged in advance that the money received for the silver shall be applied in payment for agricultural exports, the products of the United States.

In my opinion, the greatest benefit of the Silver Purchase Act so far has been in relation to our exports. It was admitted by Mr. Eccles that substantially all the silver purchased in London furnished the financial means with which our products were purchased. I think the same admission was made by Mr. Morgenthau.

If those in this body speaking for the agriculturalists feel that there will be any advantage in having the money received in the purchase of foreign silver applied to agricultural exports, that is a matter for their determination. Of course, I do not intend to discuss this matter during the time of the Senator from Utah, but I should like very much to hear from some of the leaders on this side as to the necessity for a further continuance of the Silver Purchase Act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. KING. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill providing that sections 3 and 4 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, approved January 30, 1934, shall be repealed. The amendment is to the bill, not in the form of a substitute but to be added to the bill, which may finally receive the approval of the Senate. I would provide that section 2 of section 5 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, approved January 30, 1934, shall be amended to read as follows:

SEC. 5. Except as hereinafter provided, no gold shall hereafter be coined, and no gold coin shall hereafter be paid out or delivered by the United States: Provided, however, That coinage may continue to be executed by the mints of the United States for foreign countries in accordance with the act of January 29, 1874 (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 367): And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, may provide for the coinage of gold coins of the value of $10 and $20 each for the purpose of paying for gold purchased under the authority of section 3700 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 734), as amended by section 8 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, and for the purpose of redeeming gold certificates: And provided further, That the President is authorized by proclamation to provide for the unlimited coinage of gold hereafter tendered for coinage, at the weight per gold dollar in grains nine-tenths fine fixed from time to time in accordance with paragraph (b) (2) of section 43, title III, of the act approved May 12, 1933 (Public, No. 10, Seventy-third Congress), as amended, or which may hereafter be fixed by law. The President, in addition to the authority to provide for the unlimited coinage of gold as aforesaid, under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, is further authorized to cause to be issued and delivered to the tenderer of gold for coinage, gold certificates in lieu of the standard gold coins to which the tenderer would be entitled and in an amount in dollars equal to the value of the standard gold coins that the tenderer of such gold for coinage would receive in such coins.

Section 6 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 is amended by striking out the words "owned by the Federal Reserve banks" from the first proviso thereof and by striking out the second paragraph thereof.

In brief, the amendment would provide for the opening of the mints of our country to the coinage of gold which may be tendered for coinage to the Treasury of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

THE CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY AND THE AIR SAFETY BOARD

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. With reference to Executive Order No. 4, transferring the Civil Aeronautics Authority to the Department of Commerce, I send to the desk a letter from Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, and ask that the clerk read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., April 29, 1940.

Hon. PATRICK A. MCCARRAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have noted with interest and with a great deal of satisfaction your action in introducing Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 43, to set aside President Roosevelt's reorganization order No. 4. This order proposes to abolish the Air Safety Board and strip the Civil Aeronautics Authority of its independence and place the regulatory control of civil aeronautics and air transportation back under the Department of Commerce.

In view of the marked contrast between the splendid safety record that has been established since the Air Safety Board and new Authority started functioning and the deplorably bad record made by the Department of Commerce when it controlled civil flying, I was surprised and utterly amazed when I heard that reorganization order No. 4 proposed to return control back to this agency of the Government.

The country's air-line pilots are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. During the period that civil flying and air transportation were regulated by the Department of Commerce was an unforgettable dark period for the pilots. Their death rate was extremely high. It is well known that there were 130 fatal air-line crashes and 146 pilots, 279 passengers, and 48 stewardesses and other nonrevenue passengers, amounting to a total of 473 persons killed during the period that the Department of Commerce regulated civil flying. I discussed this high death rate with pilot leaders on a number of occasions. They always expressed emphatically the belief that this alarming sacrifice of human life was needless and could be avoided.

When the air-line pilots started out to sponsor air-safety legislation several years ago the American Federation of Labor immediately interested itself and fought shoulder to shoulder with them for new air-safety laws. Federation representatives testified before congressional committees, pointing out the high death rate of passengers and pilots, and in addition pointing out that air transportation could never really succeed and become a stabilized business unless the highest possible degree of safety was created and maintained. Congress took heed and, under the splendid leadership of yourself in the Senate and Congressman LEA in the House and a number of other air-minded Senators and Congressmen, the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 was written, creating the Air Safety Board and the new Authority.

Today it is a different story. Instead of blazing headlines telling of another terrible air crash involving wanton destruction of human life, only a short time ago we saw the headlines in the Nation's press, "World's Air Safety Record Established." This world air-safety record amounted to 12 consecutive months of air-line operation, during which time the pilots flew 87,325,145 miles and carried 2,028,817 passengers without a single fatality. This record ended on March 26. Since that time another month has passed, which makes this record now a year and 1 month without a fatality to either a pilot or a passenger.

We have only to contrast this splendid record to prove the wisdom and effectiveness of the new law as against the fact that 473 people lost their lives during the period that the Department of Commerce regulated civil flying. It is only just plain common sense to take the position, Why not leave well enough alone?

The American Federation of Labor heartily endorses your Senate Concurrent Resolution 43, to set aside reorganization order No. 4. If there ever was an issue that is popular and right, this is it, and I feel certain that all of the Congressmen and Senators who voted for the enactment of the law that you and Mr. LEA successfully sponsored, and which has worked out so admirably, will again vote with you to maintain status quo the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 in the interest of protecting America's air-line pilots and the safety of their passengers, America's air-traveling public.

Very truly yours,

W. GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, following the letter of Mr. Green, which has been read by the clerk, I ask that there be inserted in the RECORD a telegram received by me from J. L. Van Norman, of the Los Angeles Senior and Junior Chambers of Commerce, definitely and emphatically opposing the transfer of the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., April 26, 1940.

Hon. PAT MCCARRAN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Los Angeles Senior and Junior Chambers of Commerce today resolved as "definitely and emphatically opposed to any action which would remove the Civil Aeronautics Authority from its status as an independent agency and urges no step be taken altering the organization under which phenomenal advances and development have been made in United States aviation and record of performance set, which is unrivaled throughout the world." We are immediately taking steps to procure similar resolutions by all chambers in States of California, Oregon, and Washington, and assure you our support in your efforts in this matter.

Cordially yours,

J. L. VAN NORMAN.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I also ask to have printed in the RECORD following what has just been inserted a telegram from J. H. Foster, president of the Air Line Mechanics' Association, International.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 30, 1940.

Hon. PAT MCCARRAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The air-line mechanics throughout the Nation urge that you use your good office to defeat the President's Reorganization Plan No. IV, designed to abolish the Air Safety Board and place the civil air regulation back into the hands of the Department of Commerce. We believe the safety record we are now enjoying is due to the combined efforts of the pilots, the C. A. A., the Air Safety Board and the mechanics and while we would not like to give the C. A. A. and the Safety Board all the credit, we give them a large amount for their share and we abhor the prospects of going back to the old Department of Commerce political regime without a Safety Board when our memory takes us back to the many unpleasant tasks of mopping up wreckages of crashed airplanes and human cargo that occurred under their control.

J. H. FOSTER,
President, Air Line Mechanics' Association, International, Chicago, Ill.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask at this time to have inserted in the RECORD a public statement of President Behncke, of the Air Line Pilots Association, in reply to the remarks made by the President of the United States yesterday as reported from his press conference.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of May 1, 1940]

PILOTS' CHIEF ANSWERS F. D. ON AIR SAFETY—FACTS, NOT POLITICS, BROUGHT FIGHT ON SHIFT, BEHNCKE SAYS

Following President Roosevelt's statement assailing those who oppose his plan to abolish the Air Safety Board and transfer the Civil Aeronautics Authority back to the Department of Commerce, Capt. David L. Behncke, president of the Air Line Pilots Association, last night issued a statement defending his organization's stand in the matter.

Referring to the President's reference to "a so-called 'lobby to save lives,'" Captain Behncke said:

"The pilots are not in Washington to enter into controversy with the President or anyone else. They are here in the interest of saving lives.

"NOT SCHOOLED IN POLITICS

"They are not schooled in politics. They are schooled in flying and know what is necessary to make air transportation safe. They learned about this the hard way. One hundred and forty-six of their number met death in air crashes while the Department of Commerce had control of civil flying and air transportation. There were 130 fatal air-line crashes and 146 pilots, 279 passengers, and 48 stewardesses and other nonrevenue passengers—a total of 573 persons—were killed during this period.

"The pilots, the industry, and, I am sure, the air-traveling public do not want aviation put back under control of the Government Department that made this kind of a record. Stripped to the bone, this is the issue.

"The pilots have not implied lack of interest on the part of anyone in saving lives. On the contrary, that is what the argument is about.

"TELLS MAKE-UP OF 'LOBBY'

"Let us not forget that the world's air safety record which is being eulogized was not made when the Department of Commerce regulated civil flying.

"The so-called 'lobby to save lives' is made up of 11 veterans of the airways who represent the pilots that have established the world's air safety record which passed the milestone of a year's perfect performance on March 26, 1940. To set this record they flew 87,325,145 miles and carried 2,028,817 passengers without a single fatality. Since that date they have added another month of unblemished performance to this record.

"MILLION-MILE PILOTS

"This group, now in Washington pleading for the preservation of the Air Safety Board and the independence of the new Civil Aeronautics Authority, is made up almost entirely of million-mile pilots. They are pleading with their Representatives and Senators because they know that Congress was right when it passed the Civil Aeronautics Act in 1938.

They know that the greatest single factor in bringing about present safety in flying has been the Air Safety Board. Can they be blamed for not wanting to turn back to the old order? Certainly they should know.

"PUT FAITH IN CONGRESS

"It was not until this protection was granted by Congress that crashes diminished and then ceased. These are the men that have faith that Congress will not reverse itself and let civil aviation go back to control by the Department of Commerce.

"They are not alone in their position. It is unanimous. The entire industry is asking with one voice, 'Why not leave well enough alone?' To this voice is being added that of the air-traveling public, because where lives are involved people have a long memory.

"NOT POLITICS—JUST FACTS

"We are told that abolition of the Air Safety Board and the transfer of an emasculated authority to the Department of Commerce is proposed in the name of efficiency and economy. What it all adds up to is to destroy the Air Safety Board and the independence of the new air authority that together have brought a new, struggling industry out of a period of terrible chaos, the record of which has been blazed across hundreds of pages of legislative air safety investigating committee records and unforgettably imprinted on the minds of the American people.

"It would place the situation right back where we started from under the control of the politically involved Department of Commerce. Need more be said? It is not politics as far as the pilots are concerned. It is facts—irrefutable facts involving the preservation of human life."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. KING. In view of the fact that the Senator from Nevada has offered a statement in reply to a statement made by the President yesterday, should he not offer the President's statement for the RECORD?

Mr. McCARRAN. I supposed it had been offered.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, it was my purpose to offer the statement, but I did not wish to do so particularly following the reading of Mr. Green's letter, because it might seem as if there were some purpose to put the two together, although I know there would be no objection. I now ask unanimous consent that the statement made by the President yesterday at his press conference be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

Since the transmittal of Reorganization Plans Nos. III and IV a flood of misinformation has engulfed those sections dealing with the Civil Aeronautics Authority. Much of this has fallen of its own absurdity and needs no comment. This morning, however, we saw a group of well-intentioned people staking out an exclusive claim to a so-called lobby to save lives.

The implication that we are not interested in saving lives, which is certainly contradicted by the record of our progress in civil aviation during recent years, compels me to restate in simple terms the basic features of the reorganization plans affecting the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

I might say here that everybody is for the abstract idea of reorganization in the interest of increased efficiency and economy. However, there is a rather discouraging collapse of enthusiasm when concrete proposals are made. In selfish protection of their own special interests we always find particular groups who hitherto favored reorganization arising in protest.

As it now stands there are three agencies—the Civil Aeronautics five-member Authority, the Administrator, and the Air Safety Board—all autonomous groups, none of them represented at the Cabinet table. The inherent problems confronting them were intensified by friction, particularly within the Air Safety Board. For 5 months the Administrative Management Division of the Budget Bureau made a study at my request of the operation of the Authority. It became obvious that a change was imperative if we were to continue to move forward in civil aviation. Here, in simple summary, is the proposal:

1. Despite handicaps, the Federal program for civil aeronautics has now achieved a stature and an importance which justify bringing this program more closely into the Federal family. The proposal will place it within the framework of the Department of Commerce, where it will have a closer relationship with the important reporting services of the Weather Bureau and the essential air navigation chart service of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. More than that, it will provide representation at the Cabinet table for a program of basic significance to our national transportation and our national defense. Present world conditions make the merit of this phase of the proposal obvious.

2. The present five-member Authority, which has received such widespread praise, remains as an independent Civil Aeronautics Board, performing the basic regulatory functions. It will continue to appoint and control its own personnel and submit its own budget.

3. Certain of the Authority's functions are transferred to the Administrator to eliminate a blind spot created by the failure of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 to carry out the intention of Congress to distinguish clearly between the functions of the Administrator and the Authority.

4. The function of investigating accidents is transferred to the Civil Aeronautics Board, which, unlike the present Air Safety Board, will not be helpless to take positive steps toward preventing the recurrence of accidents. Unlike the Air Safety Board, the Civil Aeronautics Board will have the power to prescribe air safety rules, regulations, and standards, and to suspend or revoke certificates after hearing. Not only does this continue the present independence of accident investigation, but it also makes possible prompt translation of findings into corrective action.

5. Not only are we advancing the cause of air safety by these changes, but we will also realize appreciable savings. Several highly paid positions on the Air Safety Board will be eliminated and other economies made possible.

PROHIBITION OF FOREIGN SILVER PURCHASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 785) to repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, to provide for the sale of silver, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, in spite of the fact that I come from what is called a silver State, this is practically the first time since I have been a Member of the Senate that I have made a statement in regard to silver or any legislation which would affect silver. There are many reasons why that has been the case. In the first place, my colleague [Mr. KING] has been chairman of a special Senate committee dealing with silver and with silver legislation. Because of his interest in the silver question, I have known that the welfare of our State and the welfare of the administration in carrying out its silver program were in good hands, because it is more than a generation, yea, a generation and a half, that my colleague has given his time, his attention, and his talents to silver legislation and to keeping the American Government upon a basically metal base with respect to its money.

Mr. President, another reason why I have not taken part in these discussions is that I have never been on a committee which has handled any of the monetary legislation since Franklin D. Roosevelt became President of the United States. It has therefore not been my opportunity to listen to hearings, to listen to the arguments that have been put forth pro and con in regard to this great question. And now I must apologize to the Senate of the United States for not being up to the minute in regard to statistics, for not knowing what has been said in the testimony; and I confess that, due to the pressure of other things, but not by reason of lack of interest, I have not had an opportunity to give sufficient time to read the complete hearings.

Therefore, in these few remarks I must confine myself entirely to the 12 points made by our good friend the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], who sponsors the pending legislation, and I should point out here that the 12 points which he categorically mentioned yesterday are the headings from the points made by the Committee on Banking and Currency in reporting out the bill. I have not seen any minority report on it. Probably therefore that which I shall say may in a sense constitute what would have been the minority report had the minority—if there were a minority with respect to this bill—seen fit to answer the majority report.

Mr. President, I repeat, this I can do only from memory and from personal observation.

In my lifetime I have seen the money of practically all the leading countries actually working in exchange. It has been my privilege, by actual contact with it, to have seen every stage in the development of the use of money that the world has evolved since the days when money was invented in Lydia, since the time when it was announced that those of us who spend our time at the places of barter will find ourselves out of an occupation, when it was said that if we allow this money habit to become part of our economic lives, we will not only find ourselves out of jobs, but even women, even children, and even slaves will be able to make purchases.

Probably in the cultural development of the history of the world no greater boon ever came to the people of the earth than the invention of money. Without money that which we call economic democracy would be entirely impossible. Without money political democracy could not long last. Without money men could not change their stations in life. They would of necessity have to remain in that class, in that stratum, wherein they were born, because it has been by the use and the development of money that men have been able to change their status in life.

Therefore, Mr. President, the things which I am going to say today will be definitely in support of what is the fundamental concept of our Nation, the concept of democracy. The other things which I am going to say will be in support of the great money program inaugurated and carried through by this administration, which has given stability and leadership to the monetary policy of the United States, the like of which no other monetary policy has ever had in the history of the whole world.

I may call the Senate's attention to another fact, that while the silver-purchase program is merely a cog in the wheel of a greater money policy, it is important as a cog. It is necessary as a cog. The monetary policy of this administration is being challenged, I understand, by people who are frightened because of the power that has come to the Government of the United States by reason of its control of so much of the metal monetary resources of the world. Some of us are frightened of our own power. But, Mr. President, if we may assume that our country exists not only for the good of its own people, but for the sustaining of a decent economic level throughout the world, thus giving other peoples a chance to raise their standards some little bit by their industry, by their trade and by their manner of life, we may also assume that some of the resultant benefits will come back to us. I ask, When, in the history of the world, has any country, due to the policy which it adopted and which it has sustained since 1933, found itself in such a position to scatter economic blessings to the people of the world, as our country can, by keeping some economic value absolutely stable, and helping to sustain that stability?

We know that if there is one thing above all others that the world needs today it is a rock of refuge, a point of stability, and the Government of the United States stands economically and politically in a position to be that rock. It is such a rock of refuge, not because it attempts to enforce its will upon other people; not because it attempts to have others accept our ways, but merely because we stand as we do stand this day, in such a place that every person in the world, I care not who he is or where he is, if he has the least bit of capital, if he has the least bit of surplus, would rather have that capital and that surplus in dollars of the United States than in any other place.

Mr. President, that is no small matter. That has not all happened as the result of a single monetary policy; it has happened because of a number of factors, and I want to give credit to every factor that anyone can suggest. But without the stability of the money of the United States we would lose our commanding position.

Some people seem sad, some people seem angry even, that the whole world, in its investment habits and in trying to seek security, is turning here, and they imagine that we are going to be hurt.

Mr. President, what merchant, what banker gets angry because customers seek his door?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VANDENBERG in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator from Utah infer that the passage of my bill, the purpose of which is to discontinue the purchase of foreign silver only, would affect the confidence of people with respect to our monetary stability?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I shall answer that question. I have merely said that the silver-purchase program is one of the cogs, one of the spokes in the monetary wheel which has put America where it is in a monetary way. I do not want to see a nibbling away of any of those spokes. I do not want to see a weakening of those spokes. I will not admit a single one of the 12 conclusions which the Senator from Delaware has stated in support of his bill; and I hope to be able to answer each of them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me ask the Senator a question. Mr. Eccles, who is Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, comes from the Senator's State. He has a most responsible position. Does the Senator agree with him when he says that continued buying of foreign silver is most dangerous to the domestic-silver producers of this country, and that we might as well purchase seashells as to purchase foreign silver for our monetary use?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, of course I disagree with the great citizen from my State. There was a time in the history of the world when shells were money. In fact, those of us who know a little about the Chinese language realize that the dollar sign in China is a shell. It is the character for "shell." I think beads have been so used; and I am sure that on the isle of Yap great rocks have been used as money. But silver is still money. Silver is recognized as money. Silver has buying power in more places than one.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is silver recognized as a medium of exchange by any country in the world?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Certainly. It is recognized as a medium of exchange by the United States of America, and I think the United States of America is a great country.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I mean, can we pay any debt abroad with silver?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I have already admitted that I have not read a single thing about the condition of the world so far as the present laws of various countries are concerned; but I do know that before Mussolini went into Ethiopia he nationalized all the silver in circulation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And sold it to us.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. He took that silver, and, if I may put his advance into football terms, he gained more yardage with that silver and he gained more miles in his battles by buying off the chieftains who could be bought off than he gained by the advance of his armies and tanks and by the use of gas. If silver has no value, Mussolini never could have done what he did. It seems to me that if silver can take the place of armies and navies in the accomplishment of national purposes, there must be some little worth-while use for silver in the world.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not only did Mussolini sell us the silver to pay for his war, but Japan and other countries have done the same thing.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The United States is buying silver from those countries and paying for their wars.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Delaware asks whether or not silver is used as a medium of exchange in any country except the United States.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The question is, Can we pay any foreign debts with silver?

Mr. PITTMAN. That was not the question the Senator asked.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is what I intended.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not care what the Senator intended. The question he asked was whether or not silver is used as monetary exchange anywhere except in the United States. That is the question I wish to answer.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I should like to answer that question. We can pay any foreign debt in silver certificates, and any foreign creditor is glad to take them, dollar for dollar. The creditors may not want the silver, because silver has a changing value. However, they will take our American silver dollars when written on paper.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is true.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, let me answer the first question asked by the Senator. Today silver is a monetary medium of exchange in every great country in the world—in Great Britain, in France, in Italy, and even in Germany, which has a great amount of silver coin left. As a matter of fact, the Senator confuses the gold standard in his mind with monetary currency. I do not care whether the Senator calls it token money or whether it is legal-tender money.

As a matter of fact, in the past 10 years all great commercial countries of the world have increased their monetary silver coinage by more than $1,000,000,000.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. From my study of the question, I cannot find that any country in the world will take silver in payment of a debt. Of course, we are buying silver, and when we issue dollars for it, our people will take the dollars; but the silver, as silver, cannot be used to pay a single debt to a single country in the world.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. If I may offer an illustration, in the Philippine islands silver is legal tender.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not suppose there is a merchant in the United States, unless he is collecting silver bullion, who would permit me to come into his store and buy a suit of clothes or an automobile and pay for it with a hunk of silver. However, he will take the thing which represents the silver, a certificate issued by the Government of the United States. That is true all over the world. The American dollar, whether it be a gold certificate—which is not now in circulation—whether it be coin, or whether it be a silver certificate, is acceptable in the entire world in payment for goods.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. To make this point clear and easy, no merchant in the United States or anywhere in the world will take a so-called hunk of gold. Merely to illustrate my point, I have here an apparent coin which is not a coin. It is a bit of artistry. It was made by a great silversmith and goldsmith to show what the size of the American dollar would be and how it would look if we were to monetize our gold and silver and make the dollar coin consistent with the values which we have placed upon gold and silver—that is to say, gold at $35 an ounce, and the value of silver at the coinage ratio at which we still coin it. This is what someone has called a "hunk" of gold and silver together. There is a dollar's worth of gold and silver in this little thing which represents a coin. It would not be accepted by anybody. I could not purchase a package of cigarettes with it and receive change; yet it has in it all the value of a dollar.

Gold and silver are identical so far as their uses the world over are concerned. We have put an arbitrary price upon gold. We have put two arbitrary prices upon silver. Those arbitrary prices may or may not be accepted in foreign countries, depending upon the rate of exchange.

We do many things in regard to exchange. The British pound happens to be down at the present time, yet our Secretary of the Treasury has issued orders that in arriving at the value of customs duties the American collectors shall choose an arbitrary price for the British pound; and when goods are valued in British pounds, the import duties are paid upon the basis of an arbitrary price.

There is much that is arbitrary in the history of money. The whole thing is arbitrary. Gold is not a natural money. It has been made into money. Silver is not a natural money. It has been made into money. There have always been times in international exchange when there has been a difference in value. For instance, I have seen the time when I could present a dollar silver certificate of the United States and receive in exchange as much as 2 yen and 20 sen; and when I presented a gold certificate I received only 1 yen and 90 sen. It cannot be argued, as the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board has argued, that if we keep on buying foreign silver it will devalue the price of domestic silver, because he is arguing on the theory of supply and demand. He is assuming that the more silver that comes into the United States, the cheaper silver will be in the United States—a thoroughly proper assumption if the law of supply and demand were as pretty as the inventor of that law thought it was; a perfectly logical assumption if the law of supply and demand were to control prices, as the inventor of the theory in regard to the law of supply and demand imagined. The law of supply and demand is supposed to operate in a strictly and completely laissez faire world. Not a single thing about money—I do not care where we turn to it—has been evolved as the result of a laissez faire idea. Money was not a natural growth. Money was a pure invention—an invention which, as I have already said, caused the conservative merchants at the time it was invented to be frightened of the technique; and we still become frightened of it, because, in some way or another, we think that this thing may control us. May I say that in the history of the world it has controlled us, but, thank goodness—and I am about to say a very bold thing—for the first time in the history of the United States, the money of the United States is controlled by the Government of the United States and not by persons outside the Government. That makes all the difference in the world when anyone argues about money.

The Governor of the Federal Reserve Board knows that money today is an arbitrary thing; he knows that silver is not a commodity; he knows that silver does not flow in relation to the simple law of supply and demand. So long as some countries recognize silver as money, so long as our country puts an arbitrary price upon it, fitting it into our monetary scheme, so long as we have coinage values and purchasing values, and all those factors affecting silver come into the situation there is an interference with the simple law of supply and demand. We cannot take this commodity and accept it on the basis of bulk any longer. It does not flow naturally; it flows very artificially; and it is because of that fact that the monetary policy which has been adopted by our administration and which is so essential and so necessary must not be nibbled away.

Mr. President, I now turn to the sentence which the Senator from Delaware is so anxious for me to mention. I accept his thesis in the fullest that this bill does not affect anything except the purchase of foreign silver; that it does not and cannot affect the purchase of domestic silver, which is controlled by another law. Therefore, since I come from a silver-producing State, and since I realize that the passage of this bill would not affect the economy of my State or close its mines, and that the Government would still buy silver, therefore it is assumed that I should not be interested in the pending bill.

Mr. President, there are some things that are even greater than the welfare of the mine owners of the State of Utah, and one of those things is the monetary policy of the United States. I am not arguing this question from the standpoint of selfishness. If I were, I would go home to my people and say, "We concede this point because it does not affect you; I am standing only for those things which are of interest to you." Oh, how many representatives of the people have been lost in attempting to protect a given interest at the cost of losing an understanding of the bigger things that control life.

Therefore, Mr. President, in spite of the fact that the bill would not affect our domestic silver and would not affect my State or American silver mines generally, I am still opposed to its enactment. Since I have mentioned silver mines, let us accept, for the purpose of argument, the theory, which is in the back of the head of almost everyone, and which is assumed by the writer of the report, that the whole silver policy of the United States is based upon a subsidy for the silver miners; let us assume that to be so, and accept it in its grossest sense, and then let us see what we have in the way of subsidy. I might mention parenthetically, however, that it is not a subsidy. Everyone knows that there are very few silver mines in the United States. In the United States silver is invariably found in conjunction with other metals. These other metals we are anxious to have, and our economic welfare demands that we have them. The silver-program or subsidy—call it that if you will—makes it possible for second-grade mines producing other ores to remain open and for miners to be retained in their jobs. Thought of in the terms of simple relief, probably the Government of the United States is doing more in the way of relief, through this simple act providing for the purchase of domestic silver, than in any other way in which it is operating in the field of relief.

When it comes to particular commodities which are subsidized—and call it a subsidy if you will—we find, on simple analysis, that we are subsidizing, for example, American agriculture to the tune of $1,500,000,000 a year. That sum is so tremendously much greater than the little subsidy to the mines of our country that there is no comparison. As stated, I am accepting the subsidy statement for the purpose of the argument.

Mr. President, yesterday on hearing the summary of the argument made by the Senator from Delaware for the passage of the bill, I felt so completely out of harmony with the 12 points he made that I shall categorically try to answer those points, and see if the Senate of the United States is willing to retreat from a monetary policy, which is functioning well, even to the extent of modifying it in such slight degree as is proposed to be done by the pending measure.

Mr. President, the first point, as to the purchase of foreign silver, made in the report which was submitted by the Senator from Delaware is that:

> It is unnecessary. The monetary base supporting the currency and banking system has expanded alarmingly since the passage of the Silver Purchase Act in 1934, due to gold and silver purchases by the Government.

Mr. President, what was the fundamental purpose behind the passage of our monetary act? The fundamental purpose was to expand the base. We have accomplished exactly what we set out to accomplish, and now it is called unnecessary. It was not unnecessary in 1933 when, because of various circumstances, nation after nation went off the gold standard. Because they did not have the base to sustain their coinage and paper money, they made the value in money of gold higher than it was, and we did the same thing. Had we had a sufficient base we never would have had to do that. So, today, with a sufficient base to take care of the monetary needs of our country resting upon metal, we may know that there will be no necessity for another devaluation in terms of gold or silver or both by the Government of the United States. In other words, Mr. President, the argument put forth here to show that we should start destroying this monetary policy is the finest argument I can give why we should sustain it.

> The country's gold stock, following the devaluation of the dollar in January 1934, had a monetary value totaling about $7,018,000,000. Today the country's stock of gold has a monetary value of about $18,300,000,000.

Mr. President, great as that increase is, I am not forgetful of 1933; I am not forgetful of the fix Great Britain is in today; and I am not forgetful of what happened in Germany; I am not forgetful of all the countries that have found it necessary to go off metal because they had no metal. Realizing, therefore, the stability which is ours because we have that metal, and not forgetting all those things, I am not sorry that our monetary basis has reached this point.

I know what the Senator from Delaware would be likely to say. The Senator from Delaware would say, "Well, if our country acquires all the gold and all the silver, then, of course, the world will go off the metallic base." But, as we all know, the world has been forced off the metallic base; and because it has been forced off the metallic base, those in other countries who understand the actual value of metals as money, realize that it is to their advantage to have as many of their interests located in the United States as they possibly can.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KING. I may observe that Mr. Keynes, who has been rather critical of the fiscal policies of our Government, Great Britain, and other governments, has admonished us and other countries that if all the gold is concentrated in one or two countries, the other nations of the world will demonetize gold and it will become a redundant currency, so that ultimately we run the risk of having gold, if we get it all, made a redundant currency by the action of other countries. In other words, the acquisition of a large amount of silver does not necessarily mean that it will become a redundant currency any more than the large amount of gold which we have will lead to the declaration by other governments that gold has ceased to have any value, although, if we had all the gold in the world, and there was no possibility of transferring it to other countries in a legitimate way, it might lead to legislation upon the part of other countries declaring that gold should no longer be regarded as part of their monetary systems.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, in speaking about the gold base, I return to the "good old days" of the gold standard, as they were called—those wonderfully stable days—and call attention to the fact that even in those days nations had different habits in regard to their gold.

For example, Great Britain always made it a habit to keep as much as possible of her gold scattered throughout the world. She did not concentrate her gold. She felt that her money was better off in the hands of the people. That was her policy.

At the same time, a policy that worked quite as well, adopted by the French Government, was that they should always have within reach, to take care of their money, a substantial gold base. Germany followed Britain's plan; Japan followed France's plan; so that, traveling from country to country in the days of the gold standard, one went to France and found no gold; one went to Japan and found no gold; one went to Germany and found gold; one went to England and found gold; one came here and found gold; and the gold circulated all over the globe, just as the silver circulated all over the globe, and made for a tremendously great stability.

The time has come when, if we are going to maintain the advantages which we have gained as a result of the faith of the people in the Government of the United States, we shall have to start redeeming our paper money and scattering our gold and silver throughout the world again; but when that time comes we shall be in a position to do so in the most natural way possible by simple resumption, with the proper protection. While that is not our subject, and I will not dwell upon it any longer——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not want to be drawn into the question of gold in connection with my silver bill; but what will happen to us? The Senator says we may resume and send our gold and silver to other countries. But if other countries say, "We prefer your goods to your gold," what will happen when they have sold us all the gold of the world, which we shall have in 2 years if we continue at the present rate of receiving gold?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The answer to that question is, How are they going to get our goods without our money?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They will not have any more gold. They will not have any more silver. That is the question. What I was after was ascertaining how we are going to dispose of our goods.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The point I want to make is that the problem about gold is just as easy to answer as the problem about any exchange, or any credit, or anything else. When the Senator says all the gold is here, he is merely saying that perhaps all the credit is here, or all the silver is here. There are plenty of ways of causing these things to scatter throughout the world if we give them a chance, because we know the habits of the people of the world from the past. We know what the people in certain countries would do with the silver dollar if they could get hold of it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. At the present time we can give our gold in exchange; but, of course, it must be given in exchange for goods, unless we are willing to give it away. Somebody has suggested that we may want to give our gold to other countries.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. If we get over into the realm of exchange, we give our goods in exchange. We give our credit in exchange. Take my check for example, poor little check that it is, it is acceptable in Berlin today.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator's check?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator's check might be acceptable there, but I do not think mine would be.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The Senator's check would be if he were there. They would be glad to have it, and they would find a way to get good American dollars for it.

Those of us who had to wander over the globe as vagabonds, without any letters of credit; those of us who have known the value of a pound piece, an American bill, or a Russian ruble when it was good, got certain slants on the money habit which probably bankers never could get. I want to tell the Senator from Delaware what would happen if he found himself in the middle of Turkey—old Turkey, when Turkey was at war with Greece—if he found himself there stranded with his wife and his child, if he had a letter of credit which was no good, but he had two other things. The man that I know about, who was stranded there, had a $20 gold piece which was given to him by his father, and which he wore and carried; and he had a British pound piece which was given to him by his mother when she came back from England in 1900; and what happened to those pieces? No letter of credit was good. No other money was good. The money that was brought from Egypt was not good, but those two gold pieces were good. You may argue with me until doomsday, but you cannot take away from me my experience and knowledge of the value of those two pieces.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What chance would the Senator's friend have today of having those gold pieces taken from the United States?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is the whole point.

Mr. TOWNSEND. He cannot get any gold here. He is not permitted to have gold.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is why it is necessary to get this gold and silver out in circulation, that men may be secure in something.

I will give the Senator another simple illustration to show him the worth of metallic money. This illustration is one that probably has been through more experiences than any other single money illustration that can be found anywhere.

Throughout China there are no banks. When a man sells an ox, or sells his crop, and finds himself with some little profit, in fine old democratic China—economically democratic, politically democratic, socially democratic—what did he do? He put his profit in silver slugs, little round, bullet-like things, and wore them as white coat buttons, of no particular value, because each one was weighed for its value. When he built his house or built his shed, he took those slugs and put them in the adobe, or he put them in the plaster that went into his house or his shed. Fire came, pestilence came, famine came; the man was completely wiped out of all wealth. He went back and began scraping in the ashes, and he found his capital. I tell you, we cannot find that in the United States today. We cannot find that in the world, because governments have taken unto themselves these various things; but there is the essence of good economic and political democracy.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We cannot find that in China today, either, because the Japanese have taken practically all the silver of China and have sold it to the United States to pay for the war on China.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, the Senator has jumped to one of his points, so I will talk about that point. He has made a point about China and her silver. When we talk about China we have to talk about many things. The hardest thing about China today is to define what we mean by China. The Japanese have not taken Chinese silver. China has been in a state of civil war since 1911. She is in a state of almost universal war today; and because some few individuals tell us that certain silver came to the United States as soon as we began buying it, they tell us that silver has been drained out of China.

Mr. President, the silver that came out of China by the millions of dollars' worth was the silver that was owned by foreigners in China, held by foreigners in China; and it came out of China because those foreigners realized that there was no security in China, due to the threatening war, due to what was going to happen to China, and they collected on their profits; that is all. The minute peace comes to China they will be sorry they have not their silver, because with their silver they can do twice as much as they otherwise can do.

Another thing about China, just to show that faith backed up by proper work has much to do even with money; right at this time of the greatest distress in China, in the Provinces around the places where Japan is trying to force upon the Chinamen Japanese money, what money is circulating at par? It is Chinese money, founded upon a metallic base. Probably the most remarkable thing in the history of money in the whole world has happened in China, because even in times like these the Chinese paper money is universally circulated throughout that whole land, something which has never happened before, because until it was made universal, money in China was a matter of control by the various Provinces.

Mr. President, it does not matter where one goes, and it does not matter what illustration one gives, he always finds himself coming back to the fact that America, in establishing this very, very remarkable monetary arrangement which we have established since the coming into the White House of President Roosevelt, has brought a stability to that money the like of which there has never been before.

The second point which the Senator from Delaware makes is that "it imperils the future domestic buying power of the dollar." In all sincerity, can we not get a balance in making our arguments? Just what value in dollars does the foreign-purchased silver have in relation to the dollars of the United States in circulation—even the dollars of the United States purchased as a result of domestic silver?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator agree that excess reserves—the tremendous excess reserves of the Federal Reserve System—imperil the buying power of the dollar?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I answer that in exactly the same way in which I answered some of the previous questions. You cannot take a rule about money and have it hold everywhere. The time, the place, and the circumstance are three factors which have to do with it, as well as the excess in reserves. Therefore, such an argument is out, because you are arguing the point from a single factor, when there are many factors which come into the picture.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then the Senator does not agree with the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, or the general consensus, I think, of every paper in the United States which I have been able to read, that excess reserves are very dangerous to our monetary system.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am perfectly happy to accept the statement that excess reserves are dangerous to our monetary system, provided other factors are present which might upset the balance. But a lack of the proper reserves is very much more imperiling to our monetary system than an excess of reserves, and even then there must be contributing factors to which to turn.

Let me say this about the Governor of the Federal Reserve. He is probably one of the greatest economic bankers in the country, a remarkable man, a product of exactly the same environment from which I have come, and therefore I know he is a remarkable man. [Laughter.] He is a product, too, of wide experience, an experience probably very much wider, so far as relates to money, than that of anyone present in the Senate.

When you argue a point as a banker, however, you have a banker's bias, you use the banker's terminology, you find yourself fitting into the sloganized thinking of a banker. You talk about reserves, you talk about deposits, you talk about this, that, and the other thing. A banking system may not in any sense affect the monetary theory or the money of a whole country. All I make a plea for is that men will cease building a national monetary system upon a theory of a couple of proverbs taken from a banker's experience.

The second point taken up in the committee report and mentioned by the Senator from Delaware is—

It imperils the future domestic buying power of the dollar. Reserves held in the Federal Reserve System, swollen by the issuance of gold certificates and silver certificates, are now about $12,500,000,000, which is $5,877,000,000 in excess of legal requirements.

Mr. President, the legal requirements are arbitrary requirements, based upon the best judgment of those in charge of the Government at the time, in an attempt to make legal requirements fit an economic condition. What economic condition? The economic condition at the time the law came into force, of course. That is no argument for a policy of this kind taken one way or the other.

The last Annual Report of the Federal Reserve System, for example, emphatically called to the attention of Congress the dangers involved.

Dangers to what? Dangers to the United States? No. Dangers to our reserve, dangers to this, that, and the other thing. Did it point out any "buts" and "ifs"? Did it show this would be overcome if war ceased? Did it show this would be overcome if stability came back to China, and a purchasing power should appear over there? No. Conditions as of today are pointed out, and when men argue great economic processes and great economic theories, basing all they are saying on things of today, if things are not the same tomorrow the argument goes out the window. You could never base any argument on such a fallacious foundation as the assumption that just because it is our legal requirement, it is something that is right for now and forever. I think the Medes and the Persians made a mistake about that business back in their day, and where are they now?

The third point made is:

It is wasteful of American resources.

Just what American resources is it wasteful of? I will leave it in the singular. How in the wide world is it possible to waste American resources by giving paper dollars for silver dollars?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is not what we do. We give our resources, whether they be wheat, corn, cotton, or manufactured products, for silver—not for dollars but for silver—for which we pay an exorbitant price. Just to show that we do, when my bill was passed by the Senate in June last year we were paying 43 cents an ounce for foreign silver, and the Secretary of the Treasury immediately made the price 35 cents, and he has been saving 8 cents an ounce ever since then. What we exchange our goods for is silver, for which we have no use, which we take up to West Point and bury in a hole in the ground.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad the Senator answered in that way, and I am glad that he fitted his argument into a broadening of the resources. They take our goods. We have a lot of surplus goods in our country which we wish foreign countries would take and change for this value which we know we can use to our advantage.

Another thing, the Government books gain a profit on every ounce of silver that comes in—a fallacious profit, a grant. I do not think the practice of figuring seigniorage should be continued as it is, but the Treasury is profited by having it, and practically 50 percent goes on the black side of our books, if I may state it in that way.

I grant that this may all be bad. For the sake of the argument, I grant that this may all be hopelessly bad, that this may all be ruinously bad, but when you figure the resources of the United States in the billions which they represent, and tell me that the purchase of a few million dollars of foreign silver is going to upset the resources of the United States, you are telling me something that is very close to a fairy tale, because it cannot be supported.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is not millions; it is a billion dollars that we have spent for foreign silver. Apart from all the silver in monetary use, we have now a billion and a third ounces of silver that is idle, buried in a hole in the ground. The fact that we pay 35 cents for an ounce of silver and put it into a dollar at the rate of $1.29 an ounce means that we put 27 cents worth of silver in that dollar and stamp it a dollar, and our people take that, of course. But we have a billion and a third ounces of excess silver buried at West Point for which we paid over $627,000,000, against which there has not been a dollar issued.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Has not the Senator from Delaware described every money in the whole world that has had a stamp put on it? Why do we assume that putting a stamp on silver, because its monetary value is a little greater than its intrinsic value, is anything out of the ordinary? We put a stamp on paper, which has no intrinsic value.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was not trying to show that; I was trying to show that we have dissipated a billion dollars instead of millions.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I will multiply by a thousand, then, the argument I made about the comparative worth of the resources of the United States and the amount of money brought in by silver. A billion dollars covers both the domestic and the foreign purchases of silver over a number of years, not in terms of resources of the United States taken over many years, which would be greatly multiplied, because we are consuming some of them all the time. So, if we want to answer the argument which the committee has drawn up in its report, we must take the sum total of all the resources of the United States as of 1933 and 1934 and we must add all those resources together, because the value of your silver should not be considered in relation to any 1 year's resources, but in relation to the resources of many years in order to make the argument valid. I think it is a bad argument no matter what is done with it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was wondering whether the Senator from Delaware in his study of this important question has considered the fact that recently we have been paying $35 an ounce for gold, whereas formerly we paid $20-plus for an ounce of gold? Does the Senator suggest that the amount that recently we paid for gold—greatly in excess of its former price—has been a waste, has been a drain upon the resources of our country in such a measure that it imperils our financial integrity and imperils the authority of the Federal Government to maintain its obligations and to discharge whatever duties rest upon it, financially and otherwise?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the Senator will agree with me that that question can be answered only when we can see what we can do with the gold.

Mr. KING. The same argument which the Senator has been making against the acquisition of silver ought to be made with greater emphasis in regard to the acquisition of gold, which we buried at Fort Knox, Ky.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, we do not know what we can do with the gold and with the silver until we see what we can do with it tomorrow, as the Senator from Delaware has said. Is not the Government of the United States in a very much better position when it knows that it has control of that gold and silver than if it did not have control over it? I think the stage has been set for a sane, sensible monetary policy at such a time as stability and sense shall return to the world.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course, gold has an exchange value. That is, we can exchange our gold for goods. But silver has not that exchange value, and we cannot exchange it for goods. We cannot exchange silver for the goods of any country in the world.

Mr. KING. I do not assent to all the conclusions of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I do not agree with that statement for the simple reason that as the result of our purchase of silver in foreign countries that silver has purchased American goods. Whether the Senator's argument is valid depends upon the country in which the purchase of silver is made. Silver-producing countries are buying goods with the silver they sell to us. So the silver does come into the picture. Other countries are on the buying end. We are at the receiving end.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was speaking of exchange between countries. You can use gold as a medium of exchange between the countries, but you cannot so use silver.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Is it not a pretty picture that we have worked out a medium whereby we have made exchange possible, whereby purchases can be made by countries which under ordinary circumstances are not able to purchase? I think it is an argument in favor of the present plan.

Mr. President, I am sure we need not say anything more about the argument that the policy is wasteful of our resources. It is, in fact, building up our resources in creating a market in the countries that can give us their silver. Of course, it involves the bestowal of benefits abroad without the consideration of reciprocity.

Mr. President, that sounds good. It sounds lovely. It sounds selfish. It sounds American. It sounds like all those things you like to mention when you go out and make the appeal to a crowd that "what I am doing I am doing for your benefit, and for nobody else's benefit."

Let us see whether there is some reciprocity in this business or not. Let us take the one little country, Mexico, which has given us the most silver. For every bit of silver she gives us she gives us some of her resources. There is profit made by the sale of those resources. There is profit from the seigniorage. There are two gains that the people of the United States and the Government of the United States make. But reciprocity may be intangible as well as something tangible.

We all know that in business good will counts for something. Yet no one has been able to define it. We all know that in international trade good will counts for something. Yet no one is able to define that. But, Mr. President, the peace and the security of the Mexican Government, our nearest neighbor on the south, is something of intrinsic value to the United States; and if we can maintain that Government's security, if we can keep revolution from our midst by the simple purchase of silver in Mexico, are we not doing the same thing we are doing in Cuba when, by allowing her some benefits with respect to sugar, we try to keep stability in Cuba by making her economic standards such that she can afford to remain on a stable basis?

Mr. President, the point made in the committee report is invalid, when we start to think about the real situation and follow through and consider all the means of exchange which exist.

Point 4 continues:

> Under this program, for example, Japan, Russia, Italy, Germany, Spain, and Mexico have benefited while those countries were pursuing policies frowned upon by the American people.

Mr. President, when the Neutrality Act was passed, the Congress of the United States and the President of the United States refused to pass judgment upon any of those policies. It is true that the people of the United States in general are frowning upon what some of these countries are doing. Not all of the people of the United States are doing so. I myself wish that every person in the United States did. But if, for example, a little bit of stability gives some benefit to the people whose governments we do not like, allowing some trade which makes it possible for those people to raise their standards in some way or another, are we not purchasing a good will which will count for something when the time for the use of good will comes? And are we not standing in the world in the position in which we should stand as the result of the flow of investments to our borders? By this simple little act are we not standing on exactly the same platform morally as we are standing on actually because of the strength of our resources?

I do not think the argument in the committee report holds. Probably the worst kind of argument known to the whole scheme of logic is for a person to attempt to bring forth hate in the minds of the hearers, turning away from an intellectual approach to a subject to an unreasonable, emotional approach. The writer of this objection shows deliberately the countries he wishes to mention. It is hardly worthy of a Senate committee.

> 5. There is no prospect of fulfilling the treadmill terms of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Under the law the Secretary of the Treasury is obliged to buy silver until it is equal to one-fourth of the amount of gold; is that not correct?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is correct. That is, until we have a reserve base equal to one-fourth of the amount of gold in our base. There is a price idea that must also be considered. There is another alternative: Until the price of silver reaches $1.29. There are two propositions.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is exactly right. Now then, we have purchased all the silver that has been offered to us, and we are further away today from arriving at that ratio of one-fourth of the amount of silver to gold than we were when we started.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Why are we further away, Mr. President? Are we further away simply because we purchase silver?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; because of the purchase of gold.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Oh, because of the purchase of gold. Then, Mr. President, the next step of the Senator from Delaware will be to bring in a bill to do away with our gold-purchasing policy.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, I had not thought of that.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Is not that the argument the Senator is making?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. And are there not other factors besides the mere purchase of gold?

Mr. TOWNSEND. What are they?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I think the world is pretty much in a state of war and chaos. I think that gold would flow to us, regardless of the purchase price. I believe that America is in such a position today that, regardless of the price of gold, the gold of the world would flow here.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We have not been in a state of war in the last 4 years.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, since 1933 the upsetting of the monetary policies of the various countries has been going on year after year. China has been in a state of war since 1933 and her policy has been changed. The gold-standard low countries, Belgium and Holland, have changed their policies. England has changed her policy. France has changed her policy two or three times. Germany has remained constant, but she has been on a strictly managed basis. Japan has changed her policy.

Mr. President, are we not a little bit simple in our thinking when we urge as a point for the passage of this measure that the whole scheme of our silver arrangement is not working and therefore we should give up this policy?

Mr. President, if our scheme is not working, the logical thing is to bring in a bill for the repeal of all the silver provisions in our law. That would be a better way to open up the whole field of argument; but the argument has been limited by the statement of the Senator from Delaware himself that the bill does not affect anything but the purchase of foreign silver. Therefore, if the bill does not affect anything but the purchase of foreign silver, why do we bring in the argument that our whole silver program is going to fail? That is the reply I make to point No. 5.

Point No. 6 is:

The Silver Purchase Act is a demonstrable failure.

Mr. President, all that is said under point No. 5 applies to point No. 6, because it is an attack upon the whole of the Silver Purchase Act, instead of the part covered by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What was the object of the act? It was to bring the price up to $1.29.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That was one of the objectives.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Has it been attained?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Another objective was to increase our base; but the objective behind those two objectives was to keep in the world—not only in the United States but in the world—a monetary system based upon metals. That is the real objective of the whole financial program.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Has it been achieved?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. A monetary system based upon metals has been maintained in the United States, which fact has made the United States the most attractive country on earth for investments. From that fact we could draw the conclusion that probably the scheme has worked. I shall not argue that point with the Senator, because it is outside the bill; but I could argue it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course, it has made the United States the most attractive country in the world for silver. Silver is being dumped in this country, and we are fixing the price.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Is not the United States an attractive place for other things? Is it only silver that flows here? Do not other things flow? We are back again to the fact that we must take into consideration more than a single factor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. KING. I exceedingly regret to interrupt the very excellent and strong argument being made by my colleague, but I am prompted so to interrupt because of the interrogatories of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND].

One of the objects of the Silver Purchase Act was to restore—as many of us believed possible—the principle of bimetallism. I played some little part in the formulation of that measure. I went to Canada and conferred with representatives of the Canadian Government. I conferred with representatives of many of the Latin American States. Several eminent representatives of financial interests of governments of Europe came to the United States to confer with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], Senator Walsh of Montana, who has since passed away, myself, and others. A representative of the biggest bank of Great Britain came to the United States. Two representatives of the largest bank of China came to the United States to confer with us, with a view to the formulation of some plan under the terms of which bimetallism would ultimately come back to the peoples of the world.

After conferring with them, and obtaining their promise to do all within their power to have their governments acquire additional silver as a part of their metallic base, thus increasing the price of silver and bringing the relationship between gold and silver nearer to a proper ratio, we framed a bill under the terms of which we were to continue to purchase silver until, as stated by my colleague, the price reached $1.29 an ounce, unless one-fourth of our metallic reserves should consist of silver. So the purpose, object, and design was again to bring about in the world a proper fiscal policy resting upon gold and silver.

Because some of the nations of the world failed to carry out the promises which were made, we have not attained that objective. Nevertheless, the objective was proper; and if it had been attained the world would be better off than it is today. However, it is yet possible to reach the objective; and I believe the day will come when we shall have gold and silver as a monetary base of currency issues, and all the nations of the world will accept gold and silver as a part of their monetary policies.

I apologize to my friend for intruding.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In reply to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], let me say that that might have been the objective, but we have been far from reaching the objective. Not a single country in the world is on the silver standard.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that the objective is still not only within the possibility but within the probability of being reached, because when the clouds of war shall have been dissipated, in my opinion, there will be a determination on the part of nations of the world to found their monetary system upon a metallic base. Silver will be a part of that metallic base, and a ratio between gold and silver will be established which will be acceptable to the nations of the world.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator from Delaware has just made the statement that not a single nation in the world is upon the silver standard. I make the statement that not a nation in the world is on the gold standard. In that respect they are all on a par.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I agree with the Senator. Belgium is the one exception.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Belgium is not on the gold standard.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, yes.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. She is on the same standard on which we are.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Belgium is the only country in the world that is on the gold standard.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, to continue with the points, as I said when I was interrupted, point No. 6 of the committee report is that the Silver Purchase Act is a failure. All the argument which was used in connection with Point No. 5 is valid against that statement. Is it a failure?

The report goes on to say:

The Silver Purchase Act of 1934 has not achieved the objects which its sponsors promised in 1934.

Did the sponsors of 1934 promise that the objectives of the Silver Purchase Act would be attained by May 1, 1940? They did not put a time limit on that objective. They were establishing a policy which would bring about a governmental trend, to bring about that objective at some time in the future. To pronounce the act a failure because the objectives have not yet been attained is, of course, beside the point.

The report continues:

It has not raised the world price of silver to $1.29 an ounce.

It has not; but in times past, when factors were right, the price of silver has gone even higher than $1.29 an ounce. Who can predict that it may not go up again?

The report continues:

Instead, the so-called world price of foreign silver, despite the tremendous purchases of recent years and continuing support, since last July has been 22 percent lower than the average price in June 1934 and notwithstanding the additional fact that the United States Treasury is today absorbing the entire domestic production constituting more than one-fifth of the world's mine production of silver. Under the foreign silver program the United States has cleaned up the vast supplies of demonetized and other old silver in Europe, Asia, and elsewhere. (b) The American silver program has not encouraged other countries to imitate its example and restore silver to a place alongside gold as a basic monetary metal and settler of international balances of payments.

Name the nation which has had an opportunity to put forth silver as a base. Have not nations been in a rather distressed position when it comes to money and finances?

The report continues:

On the contrary, the American silver program actually has financed the demonetization of silver coin abroad and the abandonment of the silver standard in its last stronghold, China.

That, I deny. China's money policy has not yet been established. China's money policy, like her war policies, is based upon all that China can do under the circumstances, and without the silver loan from our country to China she could not have done the little she has done. Then the report goes on to say:

The American silver program has not been the promised panacea in "eliminating unemployment."

If we should repeal the act providing for the purchase of foreign silver would we increase employment thereby? The Senator from Delaware would think the question absurd if I asked him, if he was making such an argument. If he refuses to make such an argument on his side, why put such a fallacious argument into the mouths of his opponents?

The American silver program has not been the promised panacea in "eliminating unemployment," "restoring prosperity."

It has restored prosperity in one field where prosperity had to be restored.

The junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] sits beside me. May I ask him, though I know an answer is unnecessary, Has not the Silver Purchase Act done something toward restoring prosperity in the mining industry of Nevada? Certainly it has.

There again we are back to the argument I did not want to make, but if anyone argues that prosperity has not been restored, let me say that the most eager candidate for the Presidency of the United States who could be imagined, would mark himself down as utterly stupid if he should go before the people and state, "My program will restore prosperity to you, to you, and to you; but to the other 130,000,000 people in the United States these promises for prosperity merely mean a bettering of times, a bettering of conditions." If the Senator desires to give the silver program all the credit for the bettering of times since 1933, we, of course, could accept the argument, but that would be fallacious and nobody wants to indulge in such an argument. But why discount the much, comparatively speaking, that has been done by the silver-purchase policy?

These points in the report are in quotation marks, which shows that the argument is made in a belittling kind of way. I accept the quotation marks.

The report states the silver program has not been the promised panacea in raising the general level of commodity prices. As we have brought up the level of many commodity prices and the general level is higher than it was, therefore, conditions are worse. Mr. President, do you accept that argument? I do not; I think it is fallacious; there are too many factors involved. Resuming reading from the report:

The "maldistribution of gold."

Has the purchase of foreign silver had anything to do with the maldistribution of gold? Probably the purchase of gold has had something to do with its maldistribution; but, I repeat, is the distribution so "mal" as the authors of this report think it is?

Then there is a suggestion about the failure of the program to cause tariff restrictions to vanish as, it is claimed, was promised. I think the promise was somewhat invalid and fallacious.

Restoring the people's purchasing power.

Well, to the extent that prosperity has come to the people, their purchasing power has been restored; certainly to the extent the miners have gone to work, their purchasing power has been restored.

"Stabilizing exchanges."

I wish to heaven, if I may use that expression, that we could, by some sort of a monetary panacea, stabilize the exchanges of the world, in view of the condition the world is in.

In the report it is assumed that the American silver policy was a trick policy designed to remedy conditions overnight. I am sure that the authors of that policy never dreamed of such a thing, and I am sure the President of the United States and the administration that supported it have never argued in that way.

Enabling China—

Imagine anyone knowing so little about China as to write this into a report—

Enabling China "to buy our bathtubs."

What use in the world has a Chinese for one of our bathtubs?

Then the report goes on:

To buy our shoes.

Some few Chinese would wear our shoes.

To buy our shirts.

No Chinese would wear our shirts. I am sure that this argument is quoted from the speech of some one who was arguing about something else than the American silver-purchase policy.

Point 7 is:

Silver buying is not a proper instrument of foreign policy.

Mr. President, I can answer that argument merely by asking, Who ever said it was? However, the simple purchase of foreign produced silver, if the time and place be limited, I will say is a splendid part of our foreign policy, particularly as it affects Mexico. I do not think it has anything to do with our foreign policy or that it affects Siam.

A foreign policy is something which is indefinable. If the Senator from Delaware will tell me what foreign policy is referred to, then, probably, I can argue this point, but I cannot argue it as it is presented in the committee report.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does not the purchase of foreign silver apply to all countries alike, including Mexico and all other countries that have silver to sell?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Of course it does, but it is assumed that only those persons who sell us things have things to sell. It is true, of course, that the greatest exchanges for silver are located in Montreal and in London, that they deal in silver that may come from all parts of the world, and that, therefore, that makes the question of silver world-wide; but I do not think that the foreign policy of the United States, as it has been operating—and I may say operating very successfully—is based upon this simple little act.

I do not think that if we change that act one whit, if we pass the Townsend bill, the foreign policy of the United States, in general, anywhere, would be affected. But even the bill itself takes into consideration that it might affect the foreign policy in certain particulars, because the author of the bill, thank goodness, is thoughtful enough to say that no international contracts shall be interfered with by this bill. To that extent, the argument is valid. Again quoting from the report:

8. There is no other government in the world that maintains a market for the world's silver.

There is no government in the world that maintains a market for the world's gold excepting our own Government at a stated fixed price and that price will affect the price, of course, in other countries.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is there any other country in the world which fixes the price of gold and silver?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. The prices for gold and silver are fixed from day to day almost everywhere. The prices can be changed overnight under the managed-currency system.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is it not a fact that now we have about 70 percent of all the gold and a very large percentage of all the silver, and does not that fact alone satisfy the Senator that our Government fixes the prices of those metals?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I wish the Senator would argue his old bill on that kind of basis. I have been trying to throw into this argument the other factors to show how insignificant the purchase of foreign silver is in the general monetary policies of our country. I am glad the Senator has at last reached the point where he recognizes other factors. I know that he recognizes other factors, but, so far as the report is concerned, he never has done so until now.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The one factor I want to submit to the Senator is that our Government fixes the price, and it fixes it above the world market, which is verified by the fact that we get practically all the gold and practically all the silver.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Our Government a few days ago fixed the price for customs purposes of the British pound and that price is above the world market for the British pound, and constitutes actually extra taxation upon the exporter in Great Britain, for reasons which seem to be good to the administrators of our Government. Does not that sort of an argument merely emphasize what I said in the very beginning, relative to the complex nature of our monetary policy and the world's monetary policy, and, therefore, that above all other things, we should see that the American monetary policy, which has become the most stable on earth, shall remain so without nibbling it away.

The ninth point which the report makes is:

Foreign silver buying by the United States is a burden on every American.

I should like to answer that point by getting the sum total of the net burden on the American people and dividing it by 130,000,000, and seeing just how ridiculous this argument becomes in actual dollars and cents. Of course, it is not a burden upon the American people.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, why is it not a burden?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. It is not a burden because burdens are relative. It may be a burden of 1 cent per year upon each of the people of the United States, or something like that, but that is not deemed a burden. If it were, we should be afraid to tax. It may be a burden of more than that, but that is not deemed a burden in our tariff acts.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The principle is the same. Our people have to pay the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Oh, no; principles and actualities are not the same. The people do have to pay the bill, but it is easier to pay a very small bill than it is to pay a big one. We should always be honest and pay our bills; but it is a great deal easier to pay a little bill than it is to pay a big one.

The tenth point is as follows:

The foreign-silver program has been repeatedly condemned.

Condemned by whom?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Condemned by every newspaper in the United States that I have been able to find, including a great many from the Senator's own State.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I know; and the same newspapers condemn the Senator from his own State, too.

Mr. TOWNSEND. By the 12 members of the Advisory Board of the Federal Reserve System, by the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, by a great many business organizations all over the country.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I thank the Senator; and I will answer that argument by asking this question, not as a Senator but just as rhetorical question:

When the President of the United States and all the Cabinet decide that something is wrong, does the United States immediately accept the President's judgment and the Cabinet's judgment? When, in the judgment of the Secretary of Labor and all the advisers of the Secretary of Labor a labor policy is deemed wrong, does the Congress of the United States always accept that judgment? When practically all the newspapers in the United States support a given candidate for President of the United States, does it always follow that the people elect that candidate?

Mr. President, in the United States we vote as citizens of the United States as we ourselves understand our rights, and we pass our own judgment; and, thank goodness, the people of the United States do not follow all of the newspapers, as the Senator says, because the newspapers may be wrong. I do not need to cite history for that statement; but if any Senator here should carry out his oath of office on the basis of taking a survey of what the newspapers of the United States think, that man would die of St. Vitus' dance in no time.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Let me say to the Senator that the striking thing that appeared to at least this member of the Banking and Currency Committee, which considered the bill, was not so much that the bill was favored by these various organizations and newspapers, but that practically no one would defend the present policy.

I may say that I have listened with a great deal of interest and care to the brilliant exposition this afternoon by the distinguished and able Senator from Utah; and I want to tell the Senate that I am sure it is the most able defense of the foreign-silver-buying program that any member of the committee has heard.

The chairman of the committee invited the Secretary of State either to come himself or to send some one from the Department to present the matter of continuing the present policy from the angle of the State Department. The Secretary said he was not interested, and refused to do so. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, finally came before the committee and made a very fair, fine statement, but he refused to justify the present policy. I should like to read to the Senator just one question and one answer from his testimony.

After the Secretary of the Treasury had consistently stated that he did not care to defend the present policy, but merely did not want it abandoned at this particular moment, I asked him this question:

Senator CLARK of Idaho. There were some hearings before a subcommittee a year ago. If I get your thought correctly, you are not here to advance generally the wisdom of the policy established by the Congress of buying foreign silver at or above the world price. What I mean to say is, you are prepared to take it, but you are not prepared at this time to defend the wisdom of that policy. On the other hand, you feel that an abrupt cessation of that policy, regardless of its wisdom, would be unwise in view of chaotic world conditions at this time. Is that a fair statement of what you have in mind, Mr. Secretary?

Mr. MORGENTHAU. A very fair statement.

I do not want to trespass unduly upon the Senator's time, but we endeavored time after time to obtain some defense of this policy from the State Department, from the Treasury Department, and from every other fiscal branch of the Government and every other governmental agency having to do with foreign relations, such as the Department of Commerce; and not one man would come up and undertake to defend the merits and the wisdom of the present policy. On the other hand, such distinguished financiers as Chairman Eccles, from the Senator's own State, undertook to oppose the policy; and it was a rather amazing situation before a Senate committee, upon a matter of such importance and such far-reaching consequences as this, that we could get hardly anyone to undertake to defend it.

I desire again to say that the Senator's defense of this policy has been the most brilliant and the most forceful that I have heard, even as a member of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I thank the Senator from Idaho. Let me say that probably, as the Senator from Delaware pointed out in the beginning in suggesting that the bill did just one thing, it is an insignificant thing compared with our whole monetary policy, and probably that is the reason why the experts in government have not given this particular thing the study that they deemed necessary.

Mr. President, the tenth point I have mentioned, and I think we may leave that argument where we did—that the foreign-silver program has been repeatedly condemned. Of course, it has been condemned. There have been disagreements about silver; there have been disagreements about money almost since the beginning of money itself; but the condemnation does not prove anything. There may be some selfish motive in condemning a policy. For example, if the silver policy of this administration made it possible for the Government of the United States to control the money of the United States, to take it away from certain persons who had control of the money of the United States until this policy was started, I can see that probably some of the persons who lost control might selfishly think they would like to get back that control. I realize that everyone on earth is honest, true, just, and thinking in terms that will help everybody. In other words, they are altruistic; but I have known bankers, I have known money lenders, I have known persons who have made their wealth out of the control of money and out of exchange who have been opposed to any movement on the part of any government, especially the Government of the United States, ever to gain control of those resources.

I am grateful to the administration of the United States, and the people of America are grateful, that under the present system of monetary control in the United States never again shall we see a President of the United States negotiating for a loan of gold from a private banker representing a foreign corporation or a foreign interest which owns that gold. I am proud of that achievement; and when I say I am proud of that achievement I want to tell especially the Senators on this side of the Chamber who have taken this bill lightly because it merely nibbles at an insignificant part of our monetary policy, that if we start nibbling—if, for instance, all the newspapers of the United States are in favor of this step—they will be in favor of the next step, and they will be in favor of the next step.

The Government of the United States of America does not own a single newspaper in the United States. For whom do these newspapers speak? If you answer me that question, I will tell you just how valid their argument is. If you will show me the editor of a single newspaper in the United States who has taken the time to study this question for the length of time it has been discussed on the floor, probably I will accept his argument as valid.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I believe the Senator from Utah stated at the beginning of his remarks that he had not read the editorials and comments on the bill; but if he will read the editorials as they have been printed in practically all the papers of the country, I think he will find that the writers have given careful study to the silver question, and their articles show it.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I must confess now that I did read the pamphlet which the Senator sent me, in which photostatic copy taken from a hundred or more papers appeared. I read all of them, but there was not a single argument in the whole number that was based on study. The arguments were to the point that the policy is resulting in the things which the report mentions.

I have covered every point through the next to the last two points, and, of course, I would not agree with the argument. Even if I did, what validity is there in an argument based upon the one the Senator is now making, that the newspapers of the United States or the editorial columns of the newspapers sustain a certain act?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I went further than that. I cited the opinions of the 12 advisers constituting the Federal Advisory Council of the Federal Reserve Board, from all sections of the United States, and the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, who should know a good deal about the monetary system of this country. In addition, I referred to the papers. If the Senator will permit me, at the close of his remarks I shall ask permission to have some additional excerpts from editorials printed in the RECORD, so that he may read them.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, will the Senator yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. I voted to report the pending bill favorably from the committee, and I will say to the Senator from Utah that one of the impelling reasons which caused me to vote that way is not contained in the 12 points listed in the committee report. I should like to ask the opinion of the able Senator on that reason.

The Senator's State of Utah and my State of Idaho are the two largest silver-producing States of the Union. I think that in Utah there are produced somewhere around 10,000,000 ounces a year, and in Idaho somewhere in excess of 17,000,000 ounces. Together those States produce more than one-third of all the silver produced in the United States. So I have a very heavy stake in the well-being of the great silver industry in these two States.

Under the Silver Purchase Act, as the Senator so well knows, the amount of silver, both domestic and foreign, which can be purchased is limited, that is, there is a ceiling on it, and that ceiling is either when it reaches $1.29 an ounce, or when it equals one-fourth of the total metallic reserves.

Fortunately, during the last few years, the increase in gold importations has been so great that silver has had a hard time catching up. Nevertheless, the total amount of silver we can purchase is definitely limited. Whether that limit will be reached next year or 5 years from now, or even further in the future, is, of course, something which depends upon innumerable circumstances. We may in time lose some of the gold we now have, we may gain in silver purchases.

Assuming that the total amount of silver we can buy is limited, strictly from a selfish standpoint, that is, from the materialistic standpoint of protecting the silver industry in Idaho and the thousands of miners who are employed there and the millions of capital invested there, it occurred to me that, inasmuch as some day we were not going to be buying any more silver, during the period when we do buy it we should confine our purchases to newly mined domestic silver rather than increase our reserves from abroad.

Has the Senator given any consideration to that viewpoint? If in 5 years, or even 10 years, the silver mines of Idaho and Utah are in operation—and we see no reason now to believe that they will not be—then we will have to cease purchasing our own domestic silver in exactly the same proportion as we have accumulated foreign silver. Does the Senator think there is any force, from the selfish standpoint, if you please, in that reason, which is not listed in the report?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I am sure there is no force in the part of the argument which contemplates its reaching $1.29, which would be the world price, so that there would be a market for our domestic production, a very good market, at that price. If the price should go to $1.30, the United States could not buy any of it. We all know that. The silver will go where purchasers will pay $1.30 for it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator from Idaho has made some suggestions, and, basing my question upon his objections to the bill, what argument exists to support the policy of paying 71 cents, plus, for domestically mined silver, which does not with the same force exist in favor of accepting foreign silver at what might be termed the world price?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Now I am caught with two questions, and they are different. If I may continue with the answer to the question of the Senator from Idaho, there are, of course, so many factors in the question, there are so many "ifs," there are so many probabilities, that it cannot be answered in an arbitrary way. This is the way in which I would answer. No one expected silver to jump to $1.29. Everyone knew that if we raised the price of silver by 10 cents we brought some relief to the miners. It was a perfectly reasonable suggestion that the Government would cease to purchase silver the moment it reached its monetary value; $1.29 was arbitrary. It was arbitrary, though, to the extent that it was a price based upon what was a Government practice—the valuing of silver in its monetary ratio at that time.

As to the other point, if we get into the realm of silver as a commodity, a pure commodity, we must logically follow the statistical argument in accordance with that fundamental basis. The legislation itself does to a certain extent take silver out of the realm of ordinary commodities. It makes it into a preferred commodity, with a value placed upon it by law. There has been price fixing in that case.

The first part of the question was based upon the theory of mere commodities in the world market, and the Senator is assuming that if, for instance, the time comes when the world will not need as much silver, would it not be better just to limit the production to ourselves?

In the beginning of my remarks, in answering the question of the Senator from Delaware, when he wanted me to call the Senate's attention to the fact that this act had to do only with the purchase of foreign silver, I mentioned the fact that therefore we could be in favor of the act from a selfish standpoint, because it did seem to give the producers of silver in the United States a little broader market. But that argument does not have weight when we go into the whole monetary theory, which is basic, too, to the silver-purchase law. Just as surely as we nibble away one prop in this program we are going to nibble away another prop, and, as the Senator from Oklahoma has said, what argument can be given to defend the purchase of silver at 72 cents that cannot be given to defend the purchase of foreign silver? The arguments will be identical, except for the simple point of taking care of a home product. That makes a difference. But as surely as we knock one prop away from the monetary policy which we have established in our country, and, which as a whole is functioning and functioning well, we are going to have a suggestion for repeal of the law under which there is price fixing in the case of silver, which of course would be repealed if the price ever went above $1.29.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. I clearly see the Senator's viewpoint upon that, and I have heard the argument made, and ably made, that this would be the first step toward the complete repeal of the whole silver program, including the repeal of the power to purchase newly mined domestic silver.

Of course, my viewpoint is that the people generally, and business generally, are so completely agitated over the purchase of this foreign silver, that once we get that issue out of the way, we may be able to continue our domestic silver-purchasing program unmolested by such able men as the distinguished Senator from Delaware.

The difficulty is, I may say to the Senator from Utah, that when we create this free silver market here, so to speak, we do it to the exclusion of all the rest of the world. For instance, Great Britain—probably the greatest silver country in the world next to China, and I am referring to India—has compelled India to place an import tax on silver which amounts practically to an embargo. In other words, if my understanding is correct, India would like to buy silver today, and the British Government will not let her buy it, and has compelled her to refrain from buying the very basis of her money. Yet England uses us as a dumping ground for all the silver that she can get her hands on, and we are used as a dumping ground for all the silver Mexico can get her hands on, and at the same time England refuses to let any of her colonies buy silver, when those colonies use silver as a monetary base.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. May I interrupt for a moment? If all that the Senator from Idaho says is true about what England is doing in relation to India and in relation to the United States, is not the Senator putting forth the greatest argument he can possibly make as to the worthwhileness of silver as money? To whose advantage is it for England to see that India's base in silver is not increased, but that she use this silver to advantage in the United States? Silver is used in that picture no matter how it is painted, and we discover that everywhere in that picture silver as money is recognized as being vital.

Has the Senator ever heard of England having any other policy than that policy with regard to her dependency? Is not the whole theory of the gold standard based upon the fact that through that standard Great Britain, with the control of gold, can take advantage of silver countries by having a differential which makes it necessary for those people to work twice as hard as they would if they were on the same standard? For 125 years such a policy has been pursued.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. I think the Senator's statement is correct.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. And the point is that if this part of our program is repealed, it means that we definitely turn our backs against the theory that silver should be money, as part of a sensible money based upon metals, and we merely get ourselves into the argument that silver is a simple commodity, that we ought to subsidize it for the benefit of the silver mines of Utah and Idaho, which is contrary to all we know about the history of money in the world.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. We can make it a money metal, so far as our domestic economy is concerned, but until the rest of the world will take it in exchange and in settling financial balances, we cannot hope to make it a money metal throughout the world, even if we buy all the silver there is in the world.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. If Great Britain is putting a virtual embargo on the importation of silver into India, and using all the silver she can get for sale to the United States, does that not show that silver is money and not a commodity?

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. I think it does. But if England will not take our silver then it is not an international money. If they will not take our silver in exchange for the things we want to buy, as well as using it to buy the things that we have to sell, then it is not international money. When the time comes when England and France and Germany and the rest of the countries of the world will undertake to take our silver then, I say to the Senator respectfully, is the time to say, "We in turn will have a free market for silver"; but so long as we merely are the one country that will take silver, and the one country that recognizes it as money, and where every ounce of silver that comes into this country competes with an ounce of silver that is produced by the miners in Utah and Idaho, and when the rest of the world will not cooperate to make it a money metal, then I feel keenly enough about it to vote favorably with respect to the bill.

I have trespassed a tremendous amount on the Senator's time.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. There is no competition, I may say, between the foreign markets and the domestic market. When the United States pays 71 cents for the domestic silver and pays 40 cents for the foreign silver, the foreign silver is not competing with the domestic silver.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator knows that we have now on the statutes permanent law fixing the price at which the Government should buy domestic silver. Of course, as was explained several times on the floor while that bill was under consideration, the Government does not actually buy the silver by paying money for it. The silver in the dollar is worth $1.29 per ounce. When the Government took half of the silver brought to its mints as seigniorage, as we call it, or as a commission, or as in the case of the miller the taking out of a certain amount of flour when wheat is brought to him—when the Government took half of the silver, it resulted in the producer of the silver getting half as many dollars as the total production would result in the coinage of, and that meant the equal of about 65 cents an ounce for his silver.

We have now changed that proportion. Instead of taking out 50 percent of the silver, the Government takes about 40 percent—perhaps it is a fraction above 40 percent—and gives back to the producer 60-odd percent, which results in his getting the equivalent of 71 cents an ounce for his silver.

The world price of silver now is about 35 cents an ounce, and that is what we have been paying for that which has been brought in during recent months. But that world price of 35 cents is maintained in part because we are buying silver. If we were to drop out of the market for foreign silver undoubtedly the world price would decline. It might go down to 20 or 25 cents. We cannot tell about it definitely. But if the world price of silver does go down to 20 or 25 cents an ounce because we quit buying it, notwithstanding the fact that we have a permanent law providing for paying about 71 cents, would it not be more difficult to maintain and sustain to our domestic producers the 71-cent price we are now paying under the provision of our law?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that it is in the interest of domestic producers under the law as it is now, to maintain the world price certainly at a figure no less than it is at this time?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I believe it is, Mr. President.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. Is not the argument just made by the Senator from Kentucky the argument that, having gone in a bad direction, we have a bear by the tail and we cannot let him go? Is that the argument?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I hardly think the illustration given by the Senator from North Carolina is apropos. No one contends that we have a bear by the tail.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator just said that if we quit buying this foreign silver it would be very difficult for us to keep up the domestic price.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think we have all assumed, as a matter of fact, that the domestic price paid to our domestic producers is not a bear, and certainly is not a bad bear; that it is in the interest of the domestic producers, and it is in the interest of the stability of the silver industry of the United States and is not out of proportion.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to explain to the Senator that I was not speaking of quadrupeds. I was using a figure of speech.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator was not speaking of quadrupeds physically, but metaphorically. And if this bear to which he refers, instead of being a bad bear is a good bear, then it is certainly to the interest of the domestic industry to maintain the policy we are now pursuing.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I should like to revert for a second to the question asked by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK], in which he made reference to India. I should like to tell the Senator that England will start buying silver and start buying silver very, very quickly, if as the result of her embargo laws against India, India decides that silver is valuable, and the Hindu people start hoarding. The only possible way in which England can maintain any stability in that country under the present circumstances will be for her to supply to India enough silver to prove to the average Hindu who starts hoarding, who begins to have more faith in the metals and in the money that he uses, and then England will buy, and she will pay any price under the sun to get it, because the whole Indian empire may rest upon that single item. Senators may rest assured also that Great Britain under the present circumstances will never threaten India with an embargo in silver if the time is such that that could not possibly be effected. Therefore in the turning over of a policy of government with respect to a great dominion or a great principality, we may see the silver program accomplished almost overnight.

The eleventh point is the same one we mentioned in the beginning:

The stock of monetary silver has been greatly expanded.

That was one of the reasons for the monetary program. It was to expand the monetary base in order to give more stability to our money; and, therefore, instead of being used as an argument for the bill, it may be used as an argument against it. The last point is, of course, merely an appeal to the feelings of the Senators. The point is summed up in this sentence:

There is no reason for further delay.

Mr. President, the committee report gives 12 reasons why the bill should be passed. I have tried to answer each of the 12 reasons by showing that each one is fallacious. I end my argument in regard to the 12 reasons by saying that there is all the reason in the world for further delay. Whether we look to Asia or to Europe, we find instability in every phase of international monetary habit and every phase of international monetary action. But in the United States we have stability to such an extent that the whole world recognizes the fact that we have a plan which is working.

Mr. President, could any better reason under the sun be given for not interfering with the plan, but allowing it to continue, than that it is functioning and working to the advantage of the United States and the people of the United States?

Having gone over the committee report point by point, I have this to say to my brethren on this side of the Chamber:

In the fall election the Democratic Party must stand upon its record. There is nothing else for it to do. Probably the proudest point we can make to the country will be the fact that we have brought money stability in the United States. Everyone will be talking about the banking program. Everyone will talk about the money program. Everyone will talk about the surety and the success of our program in accomplishing stability. We cannot avoid arguing in that way. For us to lose faith in a program which has accomplished so much and to start its repeal at this time would be a tactical blunder on the part of Democrats in the United States Senate. I appeal to them for this reason. I appeal to them for the other reasons I have given. It is bad policy to turn our backs upon our program.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ELLENDER in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I have listened with very great interest to the speech of the distinguished Senator from Utah. The speech is very able, though I disagree with the Senator's conclusion. Before the Senator resumes his seat I wish to ask him a question, which he may answer at this time if he is prepared to do so.

I have read with some interest, and a little concern, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. I understand the position of the Senator from Utah to be that he is against the repeal of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934. The Senator from Nevada wishes to modify the act and retain the purchasing feature under certain conditions. He wants no foreign silver to be purchased unless the purchase price be applied to the purchase of agricultural commodities. He is seeking to substitute his amendment for the repeal bill introduced by the Senator from Delaware, and for the existing law. The amendment would permit the purchase of foreign silver, but under condition that the purchase price be used for the purchase and export of agricultural surpluses.

In view of the very great knowledge which the able Senator has on this whole subject matter, I should be delighted if he would give the Senate and the country his views regarding this particular proposal, which is a three-way proposal.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I have not read the amendment, but I heard it read today. There is no question that the amendment is a compromise. It is offered for the purpose of appealing to those who would vote a half-way measure rather than a whole measure. However, the amendment takes everything I have said in support of the act as it now stands—which provides for the free purchase of foreign silver—out of its broad field and places it definitely in a narrow field; and, of course, the amendment attempts to use the purchase of foreign silver for the benefit of the most distressed element in our country, the agricultural element, which is producing the greatest surplus. So the amendment is consistent with every agricultural program we have ever offered in Congress, by which we have tried to encourage the exportation of our agricultural products.

Mr. McNARY. To what extent does the able Senator think the Pittman amendment would bring about a curtailment in the purchase of foreign silver? Of course, the answer would depend upon an estimate of the amount of goods which foreign countries having silver for sale would want to buy in the United States. Would not the amendment practically bring about an absolute curtailment of the purchase of foreign silver?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. One would have to know the country, of course. If, for example, Great Britain in her silver market could control the silver which we could purchase, Great Britain would take agricultural commodities. But if, on the other hand, the silver happened to be coming from Mexico, probably Mexico does not want and will not buy our agricultural commodities. I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. McNARY. What proportion of our total silver purchases now comes from Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I do not know. Probably the Senator from Delaware can answer that question.

Mr. McNARY. I understand that the major portion comes from Mexico.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The major portion comes from Mexico.

Mr. McNARY. If the major portion comes from Mexico, the remainder, which might come from countries having silver to sell, and which would want our agricultural products, would be very small indeed; would it not?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. If I may argue in favor of the amendment——

Mr. McNARY. I am seeking to ascertain the practical net result of the operation of the Pittman amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Under the present circumstances the net result would be that Great Britain would buy Mexican silver and purchase our farm commodities.

Mr. McNARY. The result would be a very drastic modification of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Yes; except in one particular. There would still be a demand for the purchase of foreign silver, because it could be used by any nation which could use it to its advantage. Of course, while I should like to see the bill defeated, I should support the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, if by supporting the amendment we could save the program.

Mr. McNARY. I understand from the Senator's able argument that he would prefer to have the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 remain in its full integrity, rather than to have any modification such as that proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That is true, although I think the Senator from Nevada has offered his amendment somewhat as a compromise. However, he is present and can speak for himself.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to correct the Senator from Utah on the question of a compromise. I think the chief advantage of the act has been that it has furnished American dollar exchange for the purchase and export of our surplus products. In 1934, at the time the act was passed, our exports—particularly our agricultural exports—were in very bad shape. More than 1,000,000,000 ounces of silver were purchased through London.

In the hearing before the silver committee, Mr. Eccles admitted that the purchase of silver through London had furnished American dollar exchange with which to buy our exports. However, he did say that if they had not been bought with this dollar exchange they might have been bought with gold. As a matter of fact, up to the time the silver exchange was made available, they were not being bought with gold, although they might have been. The same admission was made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The question naturally arises as to whether or not the purchase of our surplus agricultural exports is of sufficient value to justify the continued purchase of foreign silver. Personally, I think it is. It certainly is unless silver is a worthless commodity. Of course, if silver is worth no more than sea shells, as the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] has quoted Mr. Eccles as saying, then we are getting nothing for our exports.

I think I can quite clearly demonstrate, even to the Senator from Delaware, that silver is not a worthless commodity. I shall undertake to do so tomorrow. In the meantime, I wish to say that my amendment is not offered as a compromise. It is offered for the purpose of giving value to the act. When I say "giving value," I am informed and believe that under the present administration silver is being bought without regard to the use of the proceeds in the export of American commodities. I doubt very seriously if a very large quantity of silver being bought from Mexico is used in purchasing our exports. The object of the amendment is to see to it that no more foreign silver shall be purchased unless the proceeds of the silver be applied to the payment of agricultural exports from this country. I think it would be an excellent thing.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The testimony of the Treasury Department before the committee at the time the hearing was held 2 or 3 weeks ago was to the effect that practically all the silver that comes in is in payment for American products which are not agricultural products. The fact is Mexico has been buying from us textiles, automobiles, and machinery. I was informed by a businessman who has recently been in Mexico that, prior to the report of the committee on this bill, the General Motors Corporation had an arrangement through a bank in Mexico City for the advancement of credit to people of Mexico for the purchase of automobiles. That is only one item. But following the report of the bill by the committee that arrangement had to be discontinued, because if those of the Mexican people who made purchases could not pay for their automobiles in silver there was no way by which the credit arrangement could be continued.

That relates only to one item; but I think the Senator is unintentionally in error when he says that recently silver has not been brought into this country in payment for American products. We bought last year from Mexico about $31,000,000 worth of silver; that is, that much came in. We use the term "buying"; but it is a misnomer, for the silver comes here in the course of ordinary trade; corporations get American dollar credit; they use that dollar credit to buy products in the United States; and it finally finds its way into the mint and assay offices and into the Treasury, and for it Treasury silver certificates are issued. Those silver certificates go into the circulating medium of our country, as the Senator from Nevada knows even better than I do. But the point I wanted to make was that my information is that it was disclosed in recent hearings that practically all, or certainly the greater portion of the silver, even that coming from Mexico, is in payment of American goods of one kind or another.

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not make a positive statement, for I have not had occasion to look up the question, but I do not believe that all the silver exchange was used in the purchase of exports in this country, although it might have been. Nevertheless, I feel that if silver is to be used in the purchase of our exports its use should be confined to agricultural exports. My reason for that must be apparent to every Senator. The commodity prices of agricultural exports are low by comparison with commodity prices of automobiles and other manufactured products.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am in full sympathy with the objective of the Senator, because I should like to see all our salable agricultural surpluses shipped somewhere else, but if it turns out that a given country, for instance, Mexico, or Canada—and I presume Canada takes a larger proportion of our agricultural exports than does Mexico—does not need our agricultural products and cannot use them, would the Senator bar the importation of any silver that would be brought in in the purchase of other commodities, such as manufactured articles, clothing, textiles, and machinery of one kind or another, the manufacture of which gives employment to the American people and thus enables them to buy even more agricultural products at home? Admitting the fine purpose of the Senator's amendment, would he bar silver from countries that do not happen to need or cannot take our agricultural products but would buy other commodities from us the purchase of which would give employment to American labor?

Mr. PITTMAN. If I had the view of international exchange the Senator from Kentucky apparently has, I would agree with him; but, as a matter of fact, when Mexico gets dollar exchange from the United States, if she is required to buy agricultural exports and does not need them, that exchange is available to Great Britain or any other country that does need them. Dollar exchange in the United States is not lost to any country that holds it. Such country can transfer it to any other country that needs it. If Great Britain needed agricultural products here, and Mexico had exchange for it, Great Britain could ship manufactured articles to Mexico and get the dollar exchange and buy American agricultural products with it.

Mr. BARKLEY. If England, for instance, during this war emergency were in a position to buy agricultural products from the United States instead of war materials, which, I presume, she, at least, considers she needs worse at this time than she does agricultural products, she would be able to acquire dollar credit here in another way without having transferred to her credits which are accorded to Mexico or any other country that sends silver to us, because I assume that if England were in a position to buy agricultural products to the exclusion of other commodities she would be able to do it in her own way through her own dollar exchange brought about by the shipment of either silver or gold into the United States.

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, we know that Great Britain is trying to conserve her gold credit in order to buy war materials in this country, and it is estimated that such credits will not last over 2 years, if for that long. Therefore, she has to buy all other imports with her exports; and when she cannot export something to this country but can export to Mexico, she will export to Mexico and get from Mexico dollar exchange.

Mr. BARKLEY. She would not necessarily get American dollar exchange by exporting products to Mexico; she might get Mexican dollar exchange; but if Mexico had dollar exchange in this country for which she had no use and with which she did not desire or could not buy American products, under the Senator's amendment she could not buy automobiles or textiles or machinery or shoes or clothing of any sort; she would have to buy farm products. If she could not use farm products, the question then arises whether by some form of coercion we could require Mexico to send her silver here, get dollar credit, then transfer that dollar credit to England or France or any other country, and in that roundabout way bring about the sale of some American agricultural products.

Mr. PITTMAN. The proposition is perfectly plain. If our Government is not allowed to buy any foreign silver unless it is to be applied on exports of agricultural products, either the silver will not be purchased or, if it is, the exchange thus created will be available not only to Mexico but to any other government to which Mexico may transfer it to for buying agricultural products.

The amendment is framed deliberately and on purpose to compel the purchase of exportable agricultural products, and not automobiles.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to ask the Senator a further question. I do not want to take up the time now if he is going to discuss the question later.

Mr. PITTMAN. I had not intended to discuss it today but at a later time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Very well.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator will yield for a moment?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I probably put words into the mouth of the Senator from Nevada which I should not have done. In calling his amendment a compromise I did not mean to name it as a compromise in the sense that has been taken here. I meant so far as the effect of the amendment is concerned it was a compromise, in the sense that it preserved the authority to purchase foreign silver but at the same time limited such purchase to a certain kind of commodities, thus making the effect of the substitute a compromise. I did not have in mind the purpose of the Senator from Nevada when I made the statement, but merely the effect of his amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a number of editorial comments on the pending bill.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hamilton (Maine) Times, March 28, 1940:

"OVERLOADED WITH SILVER

"* * * Public censure of the whole program is increasing and should bring about its cessation."

Harrisonburg (Va.) News-Record, March 29, 1940:

"OVERLOADED WITH SILVER

"In short, benefits predicted in 1934 have not been realized, and arguments for retaining such buying are no longer tenable."

Omaha (Nebr.) Morning World-Herald, March 28, 1940:

"THE BURDEN CARRIER

"Is it any wonder that the American worker and farmer—the ones who have to support the load—are beginning to suffer from fallen arches?"

Manchester (N. H.) Leader, March 22, 1940:

"ENDING A BAD POLICY

"Confronted with these facts, the Senate Banking and Currency Committee could take no other action than it did. The wonder is on what basis four members of the committee supported a continuation of the Government's policy. Common sense and the country's interest require that this absurd policy should be ended."

Asbury Park (N. J.) Press, March 31, 1940:

"SILVER-PURCHASE FRAUD

"* * * Therefore the difference between this fantastic 'official value' and what the Government paid for it is called a 'profit,' and there are suggestions that the Treasury use some of the 'profit' to pay off its debts or to spend it for various purposes."

Bridgeport (Conn.) Post, March 21, 1940:

"SILVER-PURCHASE POLICY

"The man who tried to lift himself up by his own bootstraps has gone into history as a sort of super Simple Simon. However, we think he was a real genius compared with the persons who are trying to increase America's prosperity by buying all the foreign silver that is offered our country at a price well above the natural market for silver."

Omaha (Nebr.) Evening World Herald, March 25, 1940:

"GOLD AND SILVER ACORNS

"Suppose you had a neighbor who was head over heels in debt, yet was spending twice as much as his income. And the neighbor was buying acorns—buying them at two or three times their cost of production or market price anywhere else. Acorns came flowing in from Russia, Timbuctoo, Siam—from everywhere. And he bought of all comers, bought with borrowed money. He ran out of storage space and dug great holes in the ground in which he buried his acorns. He couldn't use them, couldn't sell them, but he continued to buy. Bought acorns though his family was ill-fed, ill-housed, and ill-clad.

"What would you think of him?

"Crazy as the Mad Hatter?

"He's doing it, though. Only it isn't your neighbor. It's your boss, Uncle Sam. And he's doing the buying with your money; money taxed out of you or borrowed from you.

"The difference is that it is not acorns but gold and silver he buys."

Biddeford (Maine) Journal, April 8, 1940:

"THE SILVER BUYING ACT

"Senator TOWNSEND, of Delaware, is making a valiant effort to bring about the repeal of the act under which the Government buys foreign silver. There are few laws on the statute books for which there is less excuse."

Indianapolis (Ind.) Star, March 29, 1940:

"OVERLOADED WITH SILVER

"* * * Public censure of the whole program is increasing and should bring about its cessation."

Lowell (Mass.) Courier-Citizen, April 13, 1940:

"THE NOTE TO MEXICO

"* * * These purchases should in any event be terminated at the earliest possible moment—not in retaliation for Mexico's policy in seizing the property of American citizens, but simply because there was never any good reason in the first place why our Government should have been forced by a fantastic domestic law to load itself up with foreign silver for which it has not the slightest need."

Massilon (Ohio) Independent, March 22, 1940:

"UNCLE SAM—GENEROUS NEIGHBOR

"It is high time the United States ceased buying silver. It is to be hoped the next step will be to stop buying gold. Both are drugs on the market and costly drugs at that."

Mason City (Iowa) Globe-Gazette:

"SILVER FOLLY NEAR END

"At long last the Senate Banking and Currency Committee has voted, 14 to 4, to put an end to the screwy financial policy under which the United States has been paying more than it needs for silver that it doesn't need."

Long Beach (Calif.) Sun, March 26, 1940:

"OBSERVATIONS BY CHESTER ROWELL

"* * * Would it not be better to take oil from Mexico, coffee from Brazil, and corn from Argentina and burn them all on receipt? The loss would still be only total, and the spectacle, being more visible, would be more instructive than doing the same thing, minus the beneficent bonfire, with silver. We would get the trade—'trade,' of course, meaning only exports—and we might find out sooner this way that in the long run it must also mean imports."

Cambridge (Mass.) Bankers Magazine, April 1940:

"SILVER PURCHASES

"Foreign silver seems to have few American friends left."

Fargo (N. Dak.) Morning Forum, March 30, 1940:

"SILVER AND MEXICO

"The fact of the matter is that our foreign silver purchase policy must be considered in terms of our domestic situation. We have been buying silver from Mexico and other places that we do not need.

"* * * This has helped the silver-mining industry of Mexico, of course. But it isn't doing the United States any good."

Norwich (Conn.) Bulletin, March 30, 1940:

"ANOTHER MEXICAN GRAB

"Good and sufficient reasons have been advanced in the past for the termination of the Silver Purchase Act insofar as it involves foreign silver. That would mean an ending of the silver buying we have been doing in Mexico and put an end to the artificial price which we have been paying, and for which we are alone responsible."

Des Moines (Iowa) Register, March 27, 1940:

"FOREIGN SILVER PURCHASES OF SILVER

"If what we want to do is to increase our foreign trade, however, a gradual lowering of tariffs would be more direct, less expensive, and far more honest."

Winona (Minn.) Republican-Herald, March 26, 1940:

"REVISION ON SILVER PURCHASE

"* * * It surely reflects the preponderance of informed opinion against continuing a policy that has proved as futile as it has expensive.

"Passage of the bill will leave in force that part of the program providing a subsidy for domestic silver, continuance of which is unjustified, although for different reasons. But since, roughly, five times as much foreign silver has been bought as that of home production, the relief in terms of Treasury outlay should be substantial."

San Francisco (Calif.) News, March 21, 1940:

"SILVER TAKES A LICKING

"True, this Santa Claus policy of ours is 'good for foreign trade.' It would also be good for foreign trade if at intervals we simply gave away a billion dollars abroad, first come, first served."

Ithaca (N. Y.) Journal, March 25, 1940:

"HIGH TIME TO STOP

"It's about time something was done to alter this absurd law, even if the part authorizing purchases of domestically mined silver still remains."

Fargo (N. Dak.) Morning Forum, April 3, 1940:

"MEXICAN CONFISCATION

"One of the main sources of whatever prosperity Mexico has enjoyed in the last few years has come from our purchase of Mexican silver. And yet Mexico seems wholly unconcerned about Washington."

Rome (N. Y.) Daily Sentinel, March 22, 1940:

"FOREIGN SILVER PURCHASES

"It is bad enough for our Government to be accumulating most of the world's gold for burial in Kentucky; it is wholly foolish to be buying other people's silver under the pretense of aiding our own mines, whereas in very truth our purchases of Mexican silver have assisted that country in its policy of expropriating the properties of American oil companies."

Brockton (Mass.) Enterprise, March 29, 1940:

"END THE SILVER PURCHASES

"Secretary Morgenthau's specious plea that to end the foreign silver-buying authority might complicate 'chaotic' world conditions does not hold water."

Rock Island (Ill.) Argus, March 27, 1940:

"SILVER VAGARIES NEAR END

"If you don't understand how such things can be, you are in good company. No independent economists ever understood, either.

"We wonder what kind of fools our neighbors, Mexico and Canada, believe us to be while they have been on our relief rolls."

San Antonio (Tex.) Express, March 31, 1940:

"SLAP FOR MORGENTHAU

"* * * But it is certain that when we subsidize exports by paying for silver much more than it is worth, we give something for nothing and, unless the profit on the exports is more than the bonus on the silver, it is a losing transaction."

Danville (Ill.) Commercial News, April 1, 1940:

"HIGH TIME TO STOP

"It's about time something was done to alter this absurd law, even if the part authorizing purchases of domestically mined silver still remains."

Norfolk (Va.) Virginian Pilot, March 22, 1940:

"LIMITING THE SILVER PURCHASE FOLLY

"* * * Such a policy violates common sense and must give way to a rational readjustment, however immediately painful. The Townsend bill will force this overdue readjustment and deserves enactment."

Elyria (Ohio) Chronicle Telegram, March 25, 1940:

"END THIS FOREIGN SILVER BUYING

"If we stop buying foreign silver, the world price will probably sag and our silver pile will be worth less than we paid for it. But it is better to take a loss now than go on compounding silliness and storing up bigger losses."

New Haven (Conn.) Register, March 27, 1940:

"MEXICO LENDS A HAND

"Recent action taken by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee in favor of rescinding the foreign silver buying powers granted to the President several years ago raised hopes that at last there may be an end to this particular piece of new-era monetary folly."

Greenfield (Mass.) Recorder-Gazette, March 21, 1940:

"SILVER WEARS THIN

"Whatever Mr. Morgenthau may say about our silver policy having put money into countries where we desire to increase our export trade, there is every reason to doubt the benefit of trade so created. If there cannot be trade based on a free and normal exchange of commodities, without Government subsidy, both parties in the long run will be better off without it."

Columbia (Mo.) Missourian, March 23, 1940:

"THE SILVER REPEAL

"The Silver Purchase Act is unsound economically, and since the reasons for passing it and continuing to enforce it are all political it should be repealed."

Middletown (Conn.) Press, March 21, 1940:

"SILVER LAW REPEAL

"It is surprising to find that Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau advised against repealing the law. It is up to the Senate and House to meet the situation in the public interest."

Kels (Wash.) Kelsonian, April 2, 1940:

"NONSENSICAL

"Over our silver policy, however, there is apparently no argument. All are agreed that it is nonsensical."

Chicago (Ill.) News, March 23, 1940:

"END OF THE SILVER RACKET

"Our only regret is that the Townsend bill doesn't go the whole distance and abolish the domestic silver-buying racket as well as the foreign variety."

Newburgh (N. Y.) News, April 13, 1940:

"MONEY WASTED ON SILVER

"* * * Our manufacturers, workers, farmers, and even taxpayers are sold down the river in pursuance of a fanciful policy which enriches foreigners, makes them arrogant, causes them, as Mexico has, to snap their fingers at us, steal lands and properties of Americans."

Terre Haute (Ind.) Star, April 17, 1940:

"SILVER PURCHASE BLUNDER

"* * * Congress, in its present movement to repeal the act, can be criticized only on two points: (1) For not having done so earlier, and (2) in not repealing the clause referring to domestic purchases."

Allentown (Pa.) Call, March 22, 1940:

"REPEAL SILVER PURCHASE ACT

"For folly, few acts of Congress ever have achieved the heights of this fault that have been revealed in the operation of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934."

York (Pa.) Dispatch, March 30, 1940:

"SILVER PURCHASE FRAUD

"Every reputable economist in the country knows the silver-purchase provision is a fraud, but it goes on year after year. The vast hoard, with its fictitious value, moreover, stands as a constant invitation to that inflation which the whole country fears and dreads."

Waco (Tex.) News-Tribune:

"QUESTION OF SILVER

"* * * Even the silver Senators responsible for the initiation of the program in the first place ran out when called on to defend it."

Bakersfield (Calif.) Californian, March 20, 1940:

"PILING UP SILVER

"Back of the program for the buying of this foreign silver must be some explanation, but no one has offered it, not to the extent of satisfying a curious public.

"* * * Why should we pile up nearly a half billion dollars in silver in Treasury vaults to maintain production of that commodity abroad and supply labor to alien peoples. Perhaps somebody can give a reason, but no one has as yet."

Dayton (Ohio) News, March 25, 1940:

"SILVER

"Senator TOWNSEND, of Delaware, deserves credit for an able fight to end it. The fight seems at last on the verge of being successful."

Somerset (Pa.) American, March 26, 1940:

"UNPOPULAR

"The idea that Mexico may regard such a policy as retaliation for her theft of American owners' oil can have no standing because it would apply even against honest nations that have been willing to set their lines to catch suckers."

Asheville (N. C.) Citizen, March 23, 1940:

"'FRIENDS' AND SILVER

"This is hardly a shining example of neighborliness. Who, then, are our 'friends' of the silver subsidy? To answer, Secretary Morgenthau will have to search a horizon that seems for the moment barren of reciprocal friendship so far as Uncle Sam's silver policy is concerned."

Binghamton (N. Y.) Press, March 27, 1940:

"Aside from the question of subsidizing a country which has proved unfriendly in its trade relations with the United States, the whole theory behind the foreign silver purchases is unsound."

Orlando (Fla.) Reporter-Star, March 21, 1940:

"The Japanese have long ago taken over the Chinese silver trade, which leaves only Mexico as the friendly nation to benefit.

"* * * There's little reason for us to buy the metal if we can't use it."

Staunton (Va.) Leader, March 25, 1940:

"Thus we again see that our policy of playing Santa Claus to foreign nations not only costs us dearly but fails to purchase their friendship. As a matter of fact most of them get from us everything they can and then laugh at us."

Hornell (N. Y.) Tribune, March 29, 1940:

"OVERLOADED WITH SILVER

"This building up of a huge silver hoard gives away American purchasing power in return for a metal which is not needed as a money base but which adds to the potentialities of inflation."

Fitchburg (Mass.) The Sentinel, April 2, 1940:

"END THE SILVER PURCHASES

"Despite pressure from the administration, the Senate Banking and Currency Committee has approved, 14 to 4, a bill to end all purchases of foreign silver by the Treasury. With this favorable recommendation, the bill should be passed.

"The Treasury is reported to have 3,000,000,000 ounces of silver in its monetary stock. It has no need for any such accumulation. Why should it keep adding to it?"

Fargo (N. Dak.) Evening Forum, March 30, 1940:

"SILVER AND MEXICO

"* * * It is high time that we took steps to do away with this foreign silver-buying folly and that means at this session of Congress. * * * "

Virginia (Minn.) Enterprise, March 30, 1940:

"WHAT DO YOU THINK ABOUT THE UNITED STATES GOLD-, SILVER-BUYING PLAN?

"* * * Does it look like good business to buy the world's gold and silver at prices which sell Uncle Sam short?

"* * * There is no sense in underwriting foreign treasuries at the expense of America.

"Senator JOHN G. TOWNSEND, Jr., of Delaware, has presented a bill in Congress to terminate the buying of foreign silver and gold. It ought to pass, but it won't, and this because the Roosevelt administration is opposed to it."

Abilene (Tex.) Evening Reporter News, April 1, 1940:

"OVERLOADED WITH SILVER

"* * * This building up of a huge silver hoard gives away American purchasing power in return for a metal which is not needed as a money base but which adds to the potentialities of inflation. The artificial price put on it benefits the silver sellers at the expense of the Nation as a whole and rewards Mexico for appropriating American oil properties."

Little Rock (Ark.) Democrat, April 3, 1940:

"OUR SILVER-PURCHASING POLICY

"* * * Whatever permanent benefit Mexico might have derived from silver purchase has been virtually nullified by existing unsettled conditions.

"All of which makes it plain that it is an insult to the intelligence of the people to continue a policy so obviously harmful."

Bangor (Maine) Commercial, April 5, 1940:

"SILVER-PURCHASE FRAUD

"Senator TOWNSEND, of Delaware, is making a valiant effort to bring about the repeal of the act under which the Government buys foreign silver. There are few laws on the statute books for which there is less excuse."

Chicago (Ill.) Tribune, April 12, 1940:

"MEXICAN SILVER AND AMERICAN OIL

"* * * Mr. Morgenthau's purchases make it easy for the Mexican politicians to ignore Mr. Hull's notes."

Rumford (Maine) Times, April 11, 1940:

"THE NEXT STAGE

"What arbitration may accomplish, no one knows. But if we should discontinue our purchases of Mexican silver, one may be sure we would at least be talking to the Mexicans in a language they understood."

Muncie (Ind.) Star, April 8, 1940:

"BAN ON ALIEN-SILVER BUYING

"Escape from a wasteful and indefensible New Deal policy is offered in a measure to repeal President Roosevelt's authority to buy foreign silver under the Silver Purchase Act of 1934. The bill was approved by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee by a vote of 14 to 4. The bill would not apply to domestic silver. Nine Democrats voted for repeal, with the four who opposed it among the traditional New Deal supporters."

Finley (N. Dak.) Press, March 21, 1940:

"* * * We have more silver than we can use, and our policy of buying more has held our country up before the world as an easy mark. Much better would be a policy of buying tin, something we need, rather than to continue to buy silver, something we don't need."

Key West (Fla.) Citizen, April 5, 1940:

"Maybe if the United States Government stops buying those chunks of silver bullion from Mexico, that country will cease confiscating American property after it has been developed."

Macon (Ga.) Telegraph, April 13, 1940:

"* * * By way of giving the demonstrators something to think about, how would it do for American citizens to hold a few demonstrations against this Government keeping the Mexican Government going by spending tax money for Mexican silver for which it has no need and at far above the market price? Being a good neighbor comes under one head and being a good thing comes under another."

Arkadelphia (Ark.) Siftings Herald, April 2, 1940:

"* * * The purchase price of the silver, greatly in excess of the value of the silver, is Government hand-out at the expense of the taxpayers. The Government doesn't need the silver and could not dispose of it without sustaining heavy loss."

Cold Spring (N. Y.) Putnam County News, April 4, 1940:

"TOO MUCH SILVER

"One of the principal objections to the buying of foreign silver is that it builds up a huge hoard which gives away American purchasing power. In return the United States receives only a metal which is not needed for a monetary base and which increases the possibilities of inflation."

Osborn (Ohio) Herald, March 22, 1940:

"WRITE OR WIRE YOUR CONGRESSMAN

"Personally we don't think much of the idea: Write or wire your Congressman. Nor do we believe in the theory of government that it represents: Government by petition. But if we had a yen to write or wire any Congressman, we believe that we could pick a subject that would be fitting—Silver Purchase."

Rutland (Vt.) Herald, March 30, 1940:

"SOBERING UP SILVER

"* * * It is high time that foreign silver mines were removed from the relief rolls of the United States."

Yakima (Wash.) Herald, March 27, 1940:

"HALTING SILVER PURCHASES

"* * * As a matter of fact, the program did not stabilize the world price of silver, because its price still has to be bolstered by a United States Treasury quotation, nor did it bring back foreign trade to any appreciable degree. Its only accomplishment has been that of giving foreigners the opportunity of unloading silver on the United States at an inflated price."

Savannah (Ga.) News, April 4, 1940:

"STOP FOREIGN SILVER BUYING

"* * * It is not surprising that the strong public sentiment against the foreign silver buying policy, especially the buying of Mexican silver, is finally being reflected in Washington, and that a saner view is beginning to prevail, indicating that the Silver Purchase Act is to be discarded. Concerning this unwise legislation the Dallas News has said editorially, 'Of all the monetary policies that have been tried out during the last 7 years by the Federal Government, the Silver Purchase Act has proved to be the most harmful.'"

Miami (Okla.) News-Record, April 2, 1940:

"SILVER-PURCHASE FRAUD

"* * * Every reputable economist in the country knows the silver-purchase provision is a fraud, but it goes on year after year."

Lexington (Ky.) Leader, April 2, 1940:

"THE SILVER-BUYING PROGRAM

"Of all the senseless undertaking any government ever undertook, the silver-buying program of the administration has been the most senseless."

Hibbing (Minn.) Tribune, April 4, 1940:

"SILVER—A DRAB LINING

"Since Senator JOHN G. TOWNSEND, Jr., of Delaware, began his campaign for the ending of this country's silver purchases he has stirred up considerable interest throughout the country, as a few out of many comments will indicate.

"Many more newspaper quotations might be cited opposing the silver subsidy. Perhaps in time this barrage may arouse the interest of the people in this subsidy to a few silver interests in the United States and foreign countries."

Pasadena (Calif.) Star-News, March 23, 1940:

"ONE STEP TOWARD SANITY IN MONETARY POLICIES

"* * * About all that can be said in defense of the purchase of foreign silver is that it helps certain silver-producing countries and convinces them that the United States is a good neighbor, or well-meaning sucker."

Rochester (Minn.) Post Bulletin, April 8, 1940:

"SILVER-PURCHASE FRAUD

"* * * Purchases include not only the domestic production, but the Nation is paying more than the world price of foreigners. As a consequence, the Treasury has acquired 2,200,000,000 ounces of silver, at a cost of more than a billion dollars, and all it can do with it is bury it in the ground."

Oskaloosa (Iowa) Herald, April 6, 1940:

"OUR SILVER PROGRAM

"* * * It is difficult to imagine a more fantastically foolish way of paying subsidies, however, than through the Silver Purchase Act."

Marshalltown (Iowa) Times-Republican, April 10, 1940:

"ROOSEVELT'S SILVER FOLLY NEARING END

"* * * The Silver Purchase Act has been a costly failure. It has certainly not raised the price of silver to the expected $1.29 an ounce. To the contrary, the price of bar silver is 22 percent lower than the average price in June 1934, and the United States has been squandering millions of dollars to pay off a shady Mexican regime."

San Angelo (Tex.) Times, March 22, 1940:

"END SILVER BUYING

"* * * About 83 percent of the silver is purchased by the Treasury from outside the United States at double the prices paid domestically. That's a shallow sort of relief."

Cumberland (Md.) News, April 3, 1940:

"SILVER-PURCHASE FRAUD IS A BID FOR INFLATION

"* * * It is pointed out that the Treasury would have saved about $900,000,000 in the last 6 years by placing these silver miners on the pension list at $2,000 a year each instead of trying to subsidize the business."

Corbin (Ky.) Tribune, April 9, 1940:

"OVERLOADED WITH SILVER

"* * * Much of the credit for the move toward fiscal common sense goes to JOHN G. TOWNSEND, Senator from Delaware, who has campaigned for 18 months to end the authorization to buy the metal abroad under the Silver Purchase Act of 1934."

Shawnee (Okla.) News, April 11, 1940:

"THE SILVER LINING

"More and more the Nation is beginning to wake up to the fact that the silver lining in the Federal Government's silver-purchasing program is not shining for the public but is feathering the nest of a small group of mine-company owners and some foreign governments."

Sioux City (Iowa) Tribune, April 4, 1940:

"OVERLOADED WITH SILVER

"* * * The purchasing was to continue until the price reached $1.29 an ounce, or the amount on hand equaled in value one-third the gold stocks. But silver is selling at 35 cents, it has been abandoned abroad as a monetary base, and exports need its support no longer. Public censure of the whole program is increasing and should bring about its cessation."

Kendallville (Ind.) News Sun, April 1, 1940:

"ON BUYING FOREIGN SILVER

"* * * The plea that the buying of foreign silver helps our foreign trade is obviously humbug. We would help our trade, which apparently means exports, at far less cost by devoting part of the money spent for useless silver to subsidization of our exports."

Bangor (Maine) Commercial, April 5, 1940:

"SILVER-PURCHASE FRAUD

"* * * There are few laws on the statute books for which there is less excuse."

St. Louis (Mo.) Star Times, April 3, 1940:

"CHECKING THE SILVER RAIDERS

"The cost of this 6-year experiment has been monstrous. We have paid $197,949,383 for silver mined in the United States and $912,822,539 to silver miners and merchants in foreign countries. The United States has been the world's dumping ground for silver."

Moorhead (Minn.) The News, March 29, 1940:

"SILVER BUYING AS AN EXPORT SUBSIDY

"* * * In other words, we are paying an export subsidy of perhaps 50 percent on silver and that is a very unhealthy thing. A proper regard for sound economics would require us to abandon such a program and try to create conditions under which foreign countries will buy from us because they want American goods and have real means of paying for them."

Fargo (N. Dak.) Evening Forum, April 3, 1940:

"MEXICAN CONFISCATION

"* * * one wonders how long we should keep on purchasing Mexican silver in huge quantities for which we have no use, and permit Mexico to do what she pleases about Mexican policy toward the United States * * *."

Cape Girardeau (Mo.) Southeast Missourian, April 1, 1940:

"SILVER SUBSIDY BROUGHT OUT IN THE OPEN

"* * * With millions upon millions constantly pouring out into all kinds of subsidies, none of which have shown any beneficial results whatever, is it any wonder that the national debt has reached the limit while at the same time unemployment has broken all previous records and all bounds?"

St. Louis (Mo.) Star-Times, April 1, 1940:

"THE HIRED MAN CAN'T BE SMART IF HE PAYS A DOLLAR FOR 10-CENT FUEL OIL

"* * * What is done with the silver? Why, it is buried in the ground and guarded by troops. It is something over eleven hundred million dollars' worth of junk.

"* * * If that doesn't disturb your confidence in the wisdom and trustworthiness of your agents in Washington, you are easy to please."

Waukesha (Wis.) Freeman, April 3, 1940:

"SILVER PURCHASE FRAUD

"* * * The purchases are also kept up because they benefit China and Mexico, but even if Uncle Sam had taken care of those two countries by making them outright gifts to the extent of the silver profits they have made, it would have saved the Nation half a billion dollars."

Independence (Kans.) Reporter, April 17, 1940:

"GOLD DOG CHASES ITS SILVER TAIL

"* * * The high price the country pays for gold is so profitable to gold-mine owners that they produce the yellow metal so rapidly, that the world can't produce silver fast enough to make the 1 to 3 ratio possible. And Congress, hurrying to finish its session so Members can go home to ask people to return them to office, can't find time to end this dizzy business of the gold dog chasing its silver tail."

Mankato (Minn.) Free Press, April 2, 1940:

"THE SILVER MUDDLE

"* * * the Treasury has acquired 2,200,000,000 ounces of silver at a cost of more than a billion dollars, and all it can do with it is bury it in the ground."

St. Cloud (Minn.) Times-Journal, April 3, 1940:

"STOP FOREIGN SILVER PURCHASES

"* * * Public sentiment against this policy, particularly against the buying of Mexican silver, has been growing steadily during the past 2 years. The Texas Weekly commenting on the decisive vote by which the Committee on Banking and Currency recommended the passage of the Townsend Act says, 'There was never any convincing argument in its favor nor any public demand for it in the first place. Now that the sentiment against it is finally being felt in Washington, it may be taken for granted that its days are numbered.'"

Portland (Oreg.) Oregon Journal, April 7, 1940:

"THIS SILVER ISSUE: THE JUSTICE IN IT

"* * * In short, the United States, which has already purchased more than $1,000,000,000 worth of unnecessary silver, is sustaining a Mexican regime that is definitely unfriendly and is buying from Japan what was undoubtedly seized from Chinese mines, thus helping to prolong and sustain Japan's inexcusable invasion of China."

Denton (Texas) Record-Chronicle, April 3, 1940:

"CONTEMPORARY THOUGHT

" * * * * In short, benefits predicted in 1934 have not been realized and arguments for retaining such buying are no longer tenable."

CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY AND AIR SAFETY BOARD

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, the country has been shocked by the proposed reorganization of the Civil Aeronautics Authority. Those closely familiar with the history and development of this efficient board and the general public have expressed the gravest apprehension at this move to destroy its independence.

A GREAT RECORD

We have seen many new agencies of government formed since 1887, when the Interstate Commerce Commission appeared. Among them all, that Commission has won a place meriting and receiving universal acclaim. Yet even that Commission during its early years made no such record as the splendid record of achievement and of progress which the Civil Aeronautics Authority has written during the less than 2 years of its existence. I wish to say here that I was glad to support that bill and to follow the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] who so ably presented it to the Senate. Certainly among governmental agencies recently formed none has made so profoundly favorable an impression upon the public mind as that created by the energetic, disinterested, and competent work which the Authority has so successfully accomplished.

SHIFTING AND UNCERTAIN GOVERNMENTAL POLICY

For 20 years prior to the creation of the Authority in 1938 civil aeronautics had been plagued by the vagaries of politics. Shifting and uncertain governmental policy, moves dictated by purely political considerations, and hopeless incompetence at the hands of government had ever since the end of the World War denied to civil aeronautics the high place which the genius of our people deserved. It is true, of course, that many men in government displayed unselfish devotion in tireless efforts to build for this country a civil aeronautics industry which would be second to none; but all too often these efforts were frustrated. Again and again during the two decades between the end of the World War and the creation of the Civil Aeronautics Authority changes in the statutes and in the governmental relationships affecting civil aeronautics threw the industry into confusion. No fixed governmental policy was adhered to for any appreciable length of time under which the industry could achieve stability. There was no consistent policy for encouraging and developing private and miscellaneous flying. The scheduled air transport industry, in the face of handicaps due to instability of governmental policy, had prior to 1938 struggled ahead—by no means so far as it might have, had governmental policies been clear and consistent, but nevertheless it had to some extent overcome these handicaps. But by 1938 private and miscellaneous flying was in such a state that our country could claim no appreciable advance in the course of nearly a decade.

SITUATION SERIOUS

This situation was serious. In fact, as other countries, our rivals abroad appreciated more clearly than we the vast potentialities of the airplane, and built more surely than we their civil and military activities in the air; this Nation in 1938 was threatened with a hopelessly second-rate position. It was bad enough that for purposes of business and pleasure our country should not enjoy a civil aeronautical development which was its due; but even worse and more dangerous was it that our military power in the air was threatened by the amazing pace pursued by other nations.

OUR MILITARY AIR POSITION

The weakness of our military position was not so much that our fighting planes were lacking in quality, or that our brave aviators were lacking in skill. Rather, the fundamental weakness of our position was that there was no backlog of manufacturing capacity which could provide for our fighting forces the vast equipment which they would need in time of emergency. The fighting strength of the modern nation depends upon its factories and upon the productive capacity of those factories under the stress of war. In the war of today the aircraft which will win must be built during time of war, and the factories and the industry to build them must be available when war begins, and the skills that make more successful pilots and mechanics must be cultivated, at least in part, before hostilities break out. In short, the modern nation, if its air arm is to be strong and true, must have available during peacetime, against the eventuality of war, hundreds of thousands of men and enormous manufacturing capacity ready at an instant to be devoted to the defense of the nation.

DEVELOPMENT OF PEACETIME INDUSTRY

This backlog which must be built up in time of peace can be secured in only one practical way, and that is through the development of a peacetime industry composed of scheduled air transportation and of private and of miscellaneous flying which will keep our aircraft factories busy and expanding, which will spread, among hundreds of thousands of our young men, the knowledge and the skills necessary to the operation and the maintenance of aircraft.

In 1938, upon taking stock of our civil aeronautics, we became aware that we had dismally failed to provide civil aeronautics which would furnish this backlog. Committees of the Congress, the President and his executive departments, and groups within the scheduled air-transport industry and among the private and miscellaneous fliers, had been giving this matter most serious study for a period of many years preceding 1938.

A PERMANENT AND STABLE GOVERNMENTAL POLICY

In the early years of the 1930's suggestions had begun to multiply for the creation by the Government of a separate and independent commission which could furnish the instrument through which a permanent and stable governmental policy for the promotion and sound development of civil aeronautics could be executed. In 1935 a commission appointed by the President and authorized by the Congress to study this matter issued a well-considered and carefully formulated report strongly recommending that a permanent statute setting forth a permanent governmental policy should be adopted by Congress, and that its administration should be in the hands of an independent commission. Although for a time the President apparently entertained the view that the regulation of air transportation should be undertaken by the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon further consideration, and upon a profound study in the latter part of 1937 by the representatives of five executive departments, the President recommended that an independent commission should be created in order that the regulation and development of all civil aeronautics could be centered in one place.

Committees of the Congress which had been diligently at work upon this problem ever since 1934 investigating, drafting bills, and making reports immediately set to work to prepare the bill which eventually became the Civil Aeronautics Act. In January of 1939, after the bill had been enacted, the President of the United States, in a letter written to the National Aviation Forum, stated the basic truth which Congress and the President had so clearly recognized. "Civil aviation," he said, "is clearly recognized as the backlog of national defense in the Civil Aeronautics Act, which set up the effective machinery for a comprehensive national policy with respect to the air."

EFFECTIVE MACHINERY ESSENTIAL

The effective machinery to which the President referred was the Civil Aeronautics Authority and its Administrator provided for in the Civil Aeronautics Act. That machinery was not hastily created. It was deliberately and carefully formed. The cardinal principle pursued was that the Authority should be absolutely independent of the political departments of government. A disastrous and costly and sad experience with the old Bureau of Air Commerce had confirmed the judgment that the first requisite to effective machinery and sound governmental policy was the creation of an independent governmental agency which could build a competent staff, which could act fearlessly and efficiently, free of the pressures and jealousies encountered in a political department.

BUILDING OUR AIRWAYS

Under the act there was provision for certain executive functions—the function of building airways, of engaging in developmental and promotional activities—and those functions were bestowed upon a single man, the Administrator of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, who would be responsible directly to the President; but all matters of regulation of both the economics and the safety of air transportation and of private and of miscellaneous flying were placed within the jurisdiction of a five-man Authority independent of the President. Cooperation by the Administrator and the Authority was provided for through specific provisions in the act. The ultimate supremacy of the Authority and its ultimate power to coordinate the activities between it and the Administrator were assured through the provision in the act that all expenditures of funds, either for the Authority or the Administrator, were to be made by the Authority itself (sec. 204 (a)). The act also provided that the Authority might at any time require that the Administrator make reports to it concerning his work and his stewardship (sec. 308). Furthermore, for the more effective handling of the agency's work, it provided that the Authority might delegate certain additional functions to the Administrator which he would perform under the Authority's direction (sec. 308). The act likewise set up an Air Safety Board for the independent investigation of accidents, and for the making of recommendations based upon investigations that would prevent accidents in the future.

Thus, with a careful division of functions, but without sacrificing the coherence and the independence of the agency itself, the effective machinery, as the President described it, was created. The method of organization was new, and, in the judgment of Congress and of the President, was suited especially to the peculiar needs of civil aeronautics.

STRIKING ACHIEVEMENTS

Even with such a new type of organization, and with few precedents to guide it, the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Administrator rapidly inaugurated the work which Congress had set forth for them to perform. In an amazingly short time this new agency began to make striking achievements.

The record made by the Authority in a little over a year and a half is well known. We cannot add to its luster. It speaks for itself more eloquently than words. In March of 1939 there occurred the last accident in domestic scheduled air transportation resulting in fatalities or serious injury. More than a year has elapsed since then without an accident. As for the development of our air transportation abroad, our flag has been carried in a pioneering route across the Atlantic to the Old World, new routes have been laid out into the southern seas, and in all that time there has been only one mishap on our lines to foreign countries, and in the profoundly important operation to Europe there has been not a single accident. Two United States Senators and two Members of the House—Senators Chavez and Lundeen and Congressmen Cannon and Mapes—have made the journey to Europe over those lines.

A DREAM COME TRUE

Never before in the history of aviation, either in this country or in other countries the world over, has there been so remarkable a record. It has been like a dream come true—a dream which only the daring would permit themselves to think of 2 short years ago. The safety record in this country in our domestic air transportation since the Authority began its work has actually been better than that of the railroads.

UNSURPASSED DEVOTION TO DUTY

If 2 short years ago only the daring would permit themselves to dream of such an ambitious achievement. Fortunately for our Nation and its welfare the members of the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Administrator were numbered among those who dared to be so ambitious. With unrelenting toil, with unsurpassed devotion to duty, they and their staff, amassing thousands of hours of overtime, set to work with a singleness of purpose and with a zeal to accomplish the impossible. And already the impossible has become an accomplished fact. Scan the pages of our history, or of the history of any other nation, search as you will, never can you find a record so remarkable and so fraught with promise for the future welfare of humanity.

CIVILIAN PILOT-TRAINING PROGRAM

Stupendous as this accomplishment has been, the Authority was not, however, content with its work in the field of scheduled air transportation. From the very first it was fully conscious of the need to make up for precious ground lost in the development of private and miscellaneous flying. Its accomplishments in that field have been as dramatic and as notable as in the field of scheduled air transportation. Chief among them, and standing out as the finest example of our democratic way of doing things, is the civilian pilot-training program which the Authority has undertaken with the sanction of Congress.

VAST PROGRAM AHEAD

A vast program, worked out in cooperation with the universities, is now in full sway, and through it there are being introduced every day to the mysteries and the delights of the air hundreds of young men and young women. The undertaking was itself a delicate one. It was not one for the faint-hearted. It meant assuming responsibility for the instruction and the training of hundreds of our boys and girls, and for assuring conditions where there could be no compromise with safety. Imagine, if you can, the old Bureau of Air Commerce, rent by politics and plagued by incompetence, undertaking a program such as this. Imagine, if you can, the parents of our Nation entrusting their children to the mercies of the old Bureau of Air Commerce, distrusted as it was by investigating committees of the Congress and by the judgment of the public. Only an agency of unquestioned integrity, of absolute independence, and of singleness of purpose, such as the Civil Aeronautics Authority, could succeed in so delicate, yet so vital, an undertaking. And the Authority has succeeded. This program is today in full swing, and it means more to our national defense than the expenditure of billions. It is an investment, furthermore, made in the democratic way. They have absolute freedom to make such use of their new skill and knowledge in pursuits of business or pleasure as they wish.

With this record of accomplishment, it is, then, little wonder that the country has been shocked at the proposal to reorganize the Civil Aeronautics Authority, to place it in the Department of Commerce, to deprive it of its independence, and to return civil aviation to a department which long ago outlived its usefulness.

Where there is no vision, the people perish.

The Civil Aeronautics Authority has planned a mighty present and visioned a grand and glorious future.

Mr. President, I ask that certain statements and articles bearing on this subject be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AIR LINES FLY ENTIRE YEAR WITHOUT ACCIDENT—12-MONTH PERIOD COMPLETED WITHOUT FATAL ACCIDENT OR SERIOUS INJURY ON DOMESTIC LINES—2,000,000 PASSENGERS CARRIED—PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT CONGRATULATES AIR LINES AND C. A. A.

On the morning of March 26, 1940, at a few minutes before 4 o'clock (eastern standard time), the domestic air lines of the United States completed an entire year of flying without fatal accident or serious injury to passenger, crew member, or other person. During this 12-month period the air lines, flying a total of more than 87,000,000 miles, transported safely more than 2,000,000 passengers for an aggregate of nearly 815,000,000 passenger-miles, thus setting new all-time records for any national air-line system.

The reaching of this safety milestone was dramatically signalized when, at 3:50 a. m. on March 26, the following message was dispatched from Washington over the 30,000 miles of teletypewriter circuit operated by the Civil Aeronautics Authority:

"Notam:[1] Heartiest congratulations to all air line, Civil Aeronautics Authority, and Weather Bureau personnel upon completion of an entire year of air-line safety. This is one of the outstanding achievements in the history of transportation.

"(Signed) ROBERT HINCKLEY,
"Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Authority,
"CLINTON HESTER,
"Administrator, Civil Aeronautics Authority,
"TOM HARDIN,
"Chairman, Air Safety Board."

Within a few minutes this message had been transmitted by radio to some 208 air-line planes then in flight. Later, at breakfast, approximately 3,000 passengers traveling in those planes received copies of the message countersigned by the captain of their plane as souvenirs of the event.

President Roosevelt, in a letter to Chairman Hinckley, hailed the accomplishment of the safety record and requested that his congratulations be sent to every air-line employee and all C. A. A. personnel. Copies of the President's letter were forwarded by air mail, special delivery, to the heads of all air-line companies, to the president of the Air Line Pilots Association, and to the chiefs of the Authority's own regional offices, and arrangements were made to send reproductions of the letter to every air-line and C. A. A. employee. The President's letter was as follows:

"MY DEAR BOB: The news that our domestic air lines will on March 26 complete an entire year of flying without a single fatal accident is indeed gratifying. Will you please extend my heartiest congratulations to every last employee of the air lines—be he field boy, pilot, or president—and to your own personnel in the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

"I am deeply impressed by reports submitted to me showing that, during the year now closing, our domestic air lines have flown 87,325,145 revenue plane-miles; carried 2,030,000 passengers, flown 814,906,250 passenger-miles, a truly remarkable aggregate. Looking behind this record, in which we can all take such pardonable pride, we find it has been achieved through cooperation and teamwork between the personnel of the air-transport lines and workers in the Federal Government. I trust that this cooperation may continue with like satisfactory results through the years ahead.

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

Col. Charles A. Lindbergh also wrote in recognition of the air-line safety record. The text of his letter, which was addressed to Chairman Hinckley, follows:

"Thank you very much for sending me the air-line safety record for the past year. I regard this as one of the most significant advances ever made in commercial aviation.

"A safety record approaching a billion passenger-miles without fatality indicates that the day is not very far in the future when most first-class travel will be by air.

"When one considers that the original problems of speed and cost of air transport have already been largely overcome, and that the development of instruments and radio will soon make scheduled operations possible under all but the most extraordinary conditions of weather, it seems clear that the air lines have passed their period of infancy and youth, and now demand their place among the mature transport systems of the world. Much still remains to be done in the extension of routes and the development of aircraft, but one may now look toward the future with as much confidence as we had hope 10 years ago. It is no longer necessary to speak of what air transport may accomplish. Our hopes have become facts with amazing rapidity, and in many instances the facts have already outdistanced our vision. I know of no one who would have dared to dream, 10 years ago, of a safety record in 1939 of over 800,000,000 miles without a fatality. Such a record is truly a milestone in the history of aviation."

Chairman Hinckley, en route to the west coast, discussed the safety record and read the President's comment on it over a Nation-wide radio broadcast from Salt Lake City, Utah, on the evening of March 26. The Chairman pointed out that the record was especially significant because it was not accomplished by shackling air transport with unnecessary and useless regulations.

"It was not accomplished at a sacrifice of the services offered by the air lines to the American public," he said. "Quite the contrary. During the 12 months just ended our common carriers of the air flew more than 87,000,000 miles. That is equivalent to flying 10 times around the world at the equator every day of the year. It is roughly equal to the total of air-line flying logged during the same period in all the rest of the world put together. It is 16,000,000 more miles of flying than was ever done in this country in any preceding year.

"The domestic air-line system of the United States is the only one in the world that flies as much by night as by day. This past year it flew almost as many miles each 24 hours during the winter as during the best weather of last summer. In fact, it set its all-time monthly record in December. Yet in spite of this intense activity, not one passenger, not one crew member, not one bystander was so much as seriously injured through the operation of this transport system."

Paying the highest tribute to the personnel of the Nation's air lines, Chairman Hinckley added, "As President Roosevelt has indicated, this safety record has been achieved through the teamwork of many thousands of individuals. It is particularly significant because it required the complete cooperation between an entire industry and the governmental agency set up for its assistance."

Clinton M. Hester, Administrator of the Authority, expressed his appreciation of the cooperation the Authority had received from the air lines and added a word for the field force of the Authority.

"I want to take this opportunity," he said, "to send a special message of appreciation to the hundreds of Civil Aeronautics Authority employees who man the Federal airways system. Twenty-four hours a day, in the blizzards atop the Rockies, in the blazing heat of the deserts, or wherever these men have been stationed, they have kept the beacons lighted, they have kept the radio ranges working accurately, they have stood radio watches to transmit weather reports and to answer the questions of pilots in the air. From traffic-control centers at key points they have watched, day and night, the movement of every air line over 25,000 miles of airways. Their share of the credit for this achievement must be particularly nameless. But there is not a man amongst them who has not contributed heavily toward it."

Tom Hardin, Chairman of the Air Safety Board of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, likewise joined in praise of the air lines.

"During the winter of 1938 and the early spring of 1939," he said, "there were but three fatal accidents on the domestic air lines. That in itself was an all-time safety record, but the air lines were not content to rest upon it. In each case, experts of the Air Safety Board were able accurately to determine the causes of those three accidents. The Board's findings and studies by the Authority's Bureau of Safety Regulation have resulted in changes in aircraft design and revisions of operating procedures of nearly every air line in the country. Most of these revisions were made voluntarily by the manufacturers and operators without the necessity of new regulations being issued by the Authority.

"The air lines were able to do this because of the stabilization of their business, brought about by the enactment of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938. To substantiate that statement one has only to compare conditions before the enactment of the act when competition, sometimes to a dangerous extent, was forced upon the air lines. Almost the first thing the Authority did on assuming office was to assure the air lines that under the ample powers delegated to it as an independent body responsible only to Congress, those who refrained from dangerous competitive practices would be protected. That was all that was needed. This year's fine record speaks of itself for the result."

Comparative statistics for the 12-month periods ending March 26 of 1940, 1939, and 1938 are shown in the following table:

CIVIL AIR BODY'S CHIEF TELLS OF FIRST YEAR'S WORK ON RADIO FORUM—ROBERT HINCKLEY ALSO DISCUSSES PROGRESS OF CIVIL AVIATION

Robert H. Hinckley, chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, discussed the first year's work and progress of the C. A. A. in the National Radio Forum, arranged by the Star and broadcast over a Nation-wide network of the National Broadcasting Co., August 1, 1939. The text of his address follows:

With the organization of the Civil Aeronautics Authority just a year ago, the relation of this Government to civil aviation was set on a new footing. After a year of experience we can take a new look at aviation's position. Scarcely more than an infant in years, much of its development has been through years of unprecedented depression. Yet the record of its achievement would have been fabulous even in the supremely prosperous 1020's.

When the Government began to publish records on civil air transportation 13 years ago, air-transport lines were operating on 8,000 miles of routes within the United States. Tonight they are serving over 36,000 miles of air routes within the United States and over 47,000 miles in foreign countries and American-built airplanes under foreign ownership and pilotage fly on many thousands of miles in addition. In a dozen years the spread of American-operated air transport has increased tenfold.

Like the clipper ships of a hundred years ago, the air lines established by American enterprise with Government encouragement and sponsorship range nearly from one Arctic region to the other, cover both oceans, and touch upon a hundred ports, both great and small. During the few minutes in which I talk to you tonight, American transport planes will have traveled a distance greater than that from Miami to Seattle. The miles that they fly daily and the passengers that they carry almost double the combined figures of the air lines of Great Britain, France, Germany, and Italy.

THREE HUNDRED PERCENT INCREASE

In the whole year of 1926, our commercial air lines carried no more people than could be seated in many an auditorium. During the 12 months just ended they carried more than the population of Detroit or Los Angeles. For every air traveler in 1926 there are 300 today.

More than 2,000 prepared landing places for aircraft spot the map of the United States, 11,000 airplanes use those airports, and there are 26,000 pilots to use the airplanes. In the year since the Civil Aeronautics Authority took office passenger travel by air has increased by a third, and the number of pilots is 5,500 more than it was a year ago.

All of these figures and illustrations add up to a single conclusion. They dramatize the fact that, moving irresistibly ahead, American civil aviation has multiplied itself many times over, without check by economic disturbance. American civil aviation has become big business.

In aviation's growth it encountered laws and regulations, and even the development plans of cities that had been drafted without consideration of the needs of this fastest-growing youngster in the transportation family. Aviation's many problems were parceled out piecemeal to whatever public agencies seemed fitted to cope with them. The Department of Agriculture handled its weather reports; the Department of Commerce, its airports and airways problems; the Post Office Department awarded the contracts for carrying the mails; the Interstate Commerce Commission fixed the rates at which the air lines would thereafter be paid for mail service; and the Departments of State, War, Navy, Treasury, and other agencies of government all intervened to varying degrees.

RAN WILD IN THE THIRTIES

The aviation business ran wild in the early 1930's. In a frenzied effort to get control of air routes, transport companies made suicidal bids on air-mail contracts and engaged in so many types of cutthroat competition that by 1938 over 80 percent of the country's transport firms had failed. It was said that more than half of all private capital invested in American air transport had been lost. The situation is fairly expressed in the report of a committee of the House of Representatives early last year. That report said:

"The result of this chaotic situation has been to shake the faith of the investing public in the financial stability of the air carriers and to prevent the flow of funds into the industry."

The committee of Congress that I have just quoted had been investigating a proposal to create a new independent Federal agency, the Civil Aeronautics Authority, designed expressly to draw together at one point all the governmental relationships to civil aviation, then so widely scattered.

Just a year ago Congress passed the law which set up the Civil Aeronautics Authority, not as something to harass the industry, but on the industry's own recommendation and request to provide a central agency through which Government would watch the interests both of the industry and the general public. So far as this is regulation, it has been sought by those regulated.

COMPOSED OF THREE ELEMENTS

Administratively, this Civil Aeronautics Authority is composed of three elements: The Authority of five members, which develops economic and safety policies and enforces them through its Bureaus of Economic and Safety Regulation; an administrator, whose principal concern is the construction and operation of the vast ground plant of the Federal airways system; a three-man safety board, which is left free of restriction and charged with the duty of finding out actual facts concerning accidents.

At this point I would like to thank the National Broadcasting Co. and the Washington Star, not only for myself and the individual members of the Authority, but also for the Administrator and the Safety Board, for making possible this radio report to the public.

In the light of world events during the past year, most of us now understand the reason that Congress had for passing the Civil Aeronautics Act. Congress was thinking far beyond the long-recognized importance of airplanes to the postal service and said so in the new law. Air transport had to be strengthened because of its vital importance both in modern commerce and in national defense.

In its relation to the economic problems of air transportation the Civil Aeronautics Act enters wholly new territory. In the first place, it puts an end to the unrestrained, cutthroat competition among air carriers which a year ago threatened the wreck of the industry, by requiring that the test of public convenience and necessity be met before a new line could be established. The new law also gives the Civil Aeronautics Authority the power and responsibility of determining the amounts that air lines are to receive from the Government for the transportation of mail. The determination has to be made after considering both the needs of the community for the service to be rendered, and the need of the transport company for an amount of revenue sufficient to serve the public properly.

FIXING OF MAIL PAYMENT

An air line is a permanently continuing enterprise. It comes into existence, in most cases, partly because of the desire for improved postal service. To insure that such service can be supplied and at the same time to permit the development of an air transportation system that will properly care for passenger and express transportation and meet the national defense, the payment to be made for the carriage of mail must be fixed after examining all the circumstances of the particular route and keeping a continuous watch on all the changes that they undergo.

The way in which mail compensation is paid can largely determine the kind of service that is rendered and the manner of its development. It is the Authority's policy to seek means of payment that will provide the greatest possible incentive for development on sound commercial lines and the display of commercial initiative in seeking increased traffic.

Payments must be sufficient to make it possible for an efficient management to do everything necessary to keep the service at the highest standard of safety and reliability.

NOT A SUBSIDY

Air transportation has a status similar to that of some other classes of mail service for which it is traditional to pay amounts sufficient to insure that they will be adequately performed, even though the expense thereby incurred exceeds the postage on mail that is carried. One sometimes hears the word "subsidy" used as if all payments for the carriage of mail by air could be properly so described. To pay the sum necessary for the proper maintenance of a necessary public service would hardly seem to be a subsidy in any event; but certainly it would be absurd to describe as subsidy the amounts paid for the maintenance of a service which automatically and at the very same moment brings most of its cost back to the Treasury in Washington. That part of the pay for carrying air mail which is covered by the postage on the letters does not come from the Government, but from the people who mail the letters. The Government is merely the channel of transmission, and that is not subsidy.

The whole domestic air-transport system has been swift in its approach to a balance of the Government's books in that sense. For the fiscal year 1938, the last for which figures are complete, the total amount paid out to air-transport lines for carrying air mail within the United States was some $15,712,000, whereas the Post Office Department's computation of the total postage on air-mail letters showed about $15,301,000. While a part of the postal receipts may of course be regarded as having been spent for handling the letters on the ground and making the final delivery, the striking fact remains that last year the United States Government paid to domestic air lines only about $411,000 more than came back to the Post Office through purchase of air-mail stamps, as against eight times that amount of direct deficit in 1936, and a difference of more than $14,500,000 in 1932. For the fiscal year just ended, the postal revenue may be expected for the first time to exceed direct payments to domestic air lines.

AVIATION'S GROWTH

There will be further extensions of the air transport network. Some of them will require rates which will substantially exceed the postal revenue that may be expected. From the moment when each line is established, however, it begins a development of inherent commercial and economic strength that tends on the whole to a steady reduction of its dependence on Government.

One of the most dramatic aspects of American civil aviation in which the Civil Aeronautics Authority has been engaged in the past 12 months has been its expansion beyond our own borders. In 12 years the route mileage operated has shown the almost unbelievable increase of 30,000 percent. Last year our foreign routes alone carried 192,000 passengers.

These far-flung, high-speed facilities also are vitally important to commerce and national defense. To the north and south they bind the commercial interests of the two Americas much closer together. And across the broad oceans our clippers show the way to the world in luxury, economy, and efficiency. Our great airliners are now being purchased in many nations, and these purchases make it possible for us to maintain at home manufacturing plants which would be priceless in any emergency.

ACTIVITIES GO AROUND THE WORLD

To serve our foreign air routes, the responsibilities and activities of the Civil Aeronautics Authority extend in varying degrees literally around the world. One American company has within the past 2 months inaugurated regular commercial air service between the United States and Europe, while a second is completing survey flights looking toward similar commercial service in the future.

Behind these great accomplishments are months of intensive study and work not only by the Civil Aeronautics Authority, but by other agencies of Government, producing for the first time a definite national policy on trans-Atlantic air service.

In close cooperation with the State Department, we have been active in a great number of international aviation conferences and in conducting diplomatic negotiations for aviation agreements with other countries.

No form of transportation could succeed if it asked its patrons to assume undue risks, and in the recent record of air transportation nothing is more impressive than its high standard of safety. In the 12 months that ended last night, the domestic air lines of the United States flew more than 73,000,000 miles with passengers, and carried an average of more than 8 passengers in each airplane, yet there were fewer serious accidents than in any year since 1926, when there was less air-line flying in that year than there is now in a month.

SAFETY DOUBLED

By any of the conventional statistics by which safety is measured, air transport during the 12 months just ended has been more than twice as safe as in any past year.

I can report tonight that there have been more than 28,000,000 miles of air-line flying since any life has been lost in an air-line accident. The total amount of passenger traffic during that "no accident" period has been equivalent to moving the entire half-million population of the city of Buffalo from their present home to Chicago without a single mishap, or of transporting the entire Regular Army of the United States from New Orleans to New York with a similar freedom from misadventure.

The superstitious may feel that I should knock on wood when I recite such figures, but it is not necessary to regard them in superstition's light, for they are not the result of luck. They are the result of hard work and wise planning, great skill, and great care. They tell a story of air-transport lines and their people, and of Government and its people, all pulling together.

Constantly improving standards of safety come from a constant emphasis on safety, and an insistence that no chances shall ever be taken and no precaution neglected. They come from the air-line pilots' pride in their profession and constant study to meet its demands. They come from the work of research laboratories and airplane designers in improving the airplanes, and from that of the Civil Aeronautics Authority in setting the requirements that new airplanes must be able to meet in all matters affecting safety.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO SAFETY

Increased safety comes from the research of the air-line operators on means of navigating safely and surely to the intended landing place, and from the research of the Civil Aeronautics Authority's own people in the same field.

Safety comes from 25,000 miles of modern airways, lighted and furnished with a network of radio beams for guidance, and radio markers of various types to give the pilot his location along his course—a vast ground plant set up and maintained under the direction of the Administrator in the Civil Aeronautics Authority, and improved from time to time as new discoveries in radio science permit.

Finally safety comes from the ceaseless study of accidents—not only the accidents that have happened but those that might possibly happen and that can be prevented if they are foreseen and the necessary precautions taken. It is for precisely that purpose that the Air Safety Board was established within the Civil Aeronautics Authority, having no other responsibilities to break into its time, and free to devote itself exclusively to study and recommendations that will save lives and increase public confidence in the airplane.

Take all the work of Government, add to it the constant efforts of the aircraft industry in its various parts, and you will know why we look forward with confidence to seeing air transportation break its own safety records over and over again.

THIRTEEN COLLEGE TRAINING COURSES

Almost as soon as it was organized, the Authority began to develop a plan for training a large number of civilian pilots. As a trial effort, with the aid of funds from the National Youth Administration, we already have conducted 13 training courses at as many colleges in various parts of the country—courses using not only the college facilities, but those at nearby flying fields. At the first 9 schools to get this course under way, 220 students were enrolled; and of these, 215 already have received their private-flying certificates.

We believe that these experiments are the beginning of proof that a very large percentage of the general public can fly airplanes—particularly since qualified instructors are extravagant in their praise of these graduates, rating their general level of efficiency far above the graduates of flying schools that have not heretofore employed the well-planned flight course now prepared by the Authority.

On the basis of this experience we asked, and Congress has authorized, a much larger program for the future.

This program is in line with the democratic philosophy which maintains that one of the best means for national defense is the development of civilian personnel and facilities which can be quickly turned to defense when emergency arises, but which may be used for peacetime activities if no such emergency develops.

PROGRAM WON'T BE A LOSS

If no military emergency develops there will be no economic loss. These pilots will use their training in aviation in peaceful pursuits. As mechanics in airplane and airplane-motor factories, as dispatchers in the airport towers, as workers in the weather stations, as radiomen, as aeronautical engineers, as airport managers, as administrators and executives in aviation companies, they will be more efficient and therefore more desirable workers because of their knowledge and skill as pilots. Furthermore, they and their friends and families are more likely to become customers of the scheduled airlines. Many will be purchasers of airplanes for business and for pleasure.

Already the effect of our small experimental training program has been felt by the light-plane industry. All companies manufacturing light airplanes report increased business and some of them report difficulty in filling orders in spite of 100-percent increase in their production. Certainly the increased employment that will grow out of the proposed training program will be a byproduct that will not be the least of its desirable features.

That is the story I wanted to tell you—the story of how American civil aviation has become today supreme in the world, and of how the aviation agency of your Government—the Civil Aeronautics Authority—has coordinated the Government's part in this achievement, during its first year of existence.

Should anyone come before the microphone a year from now to speak to a similar title, the figures he will give you will be still more impressive; the industries that deal with civil aviation will be producing still more planes, and flying still more miles with even greater safety; and still more of you in the radio audience will listen to him with more understanding interest because you will have become regular air travelers and users of aviation's service.

AIR SAFETY BOARD LAUDED BY LUNDEEN—FROM A SPEECH MADE BY SENATOR ERNEST LUNDEEN, MINNESOTA, BEFORE THE UNITED STATES SENATE

Though every possible aid to safe flying, technically and economically, be provided in the Federal airways and though every possible precaution be taken in the certification of the aircraft and the airmen permitted to use them, accidents still occur in flying as they do in most other human activities. Why? To answer that very proper question and to prevent, so far as possible, the recurrence of flying accidents, Congress, in the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, created the Air Safety Board, within the Civil Aeronautics Authority but in many ways independent of it.

This Board of three members has its own staff of experts. To it is reported every aircraft accident that occurs in the United States or on the lines of American companies operating into foreign territory. Each of those accidents is investigated. A finding on each is reported to the Authority. Wherever necessary, as the result of this investigation and report, recommendations are made to prevent the recurrence of a similar accident. In general, these recommendations call for changes in airplane construction or operation where such change is indicated by the facts of the accident, or for punishment of individuals who may have been responsible, either through suspension or revocation of certificates or through fines. In the first instance the recommendations are carried out by the Authority through changes in the pertinent civil air regulation; in the second instance, penalties are inflicted after notice and hearing before the Authority or its officers.

The Air Safety Board, as the body which investigates, determines causes, and makes recommendations to prevent the recurrence of accidents, is thus independent of the Authority, the body which manages the safety facilities of the airways, makes the regulations, and is responsible for their enforcement. The Air Safety Board is likewise authorized to make public as it deems best any phase of its work.

PROCEDURE IN TIME OF ACCIDENT

Hence it is that on all accidents of importance, such as those involving air liners carrying passengers, one or more members of the Air Safety Board, with technical and legal experts, proceeds to the scene of the accident at the first possible moment. It is now possible for members of the Board to reach any part of the United States within a few hours. At the scene of the accident the investigation of causes is thus immediately in expert and responsible hands.

Full examination of all records and circumstances surrounding the flight is immediately begun. The airplane involved and the neighborhood of the accident are minutely searched for evidence as to causes. Survivors, if any, and witnesses to the accident are interviewed, and the results of all of these preliminary investigations are promptly recorded in a public hearing. Thus, to a remarkable degree, it has been possible to strip airplane accidents of the mystery that has hitherto surrounded them, no matter how expertly they were investigated, for subsequent study and report.

THESE PROCEEDINGS OPEN TO PUBLIC

Full study is nevertheless provided for in the work of the Air Safety Board. All evidence at the public hearings is carefully analyzed; all material which might indicate the failure of any part of the airplane, its power plant, or its controls is submitted to engineering and laboratory examination and the report of the Air Safety Board is subjected to the further scrutiny, and to public hearings if necessary, by the Civil Aeronautics Authority itself before action may be taken. At all times, however, these proceedings are open to all interested parties and to the public, lest the wrong element or the wrong individual be blamed for an accident and lest an unwise change in the regulations be adopted.

The same principles are adhered to in the Air Safety Board's handling of less spectacular accidents. Full examination of all available material is made both by the Air Safety Board's staff and the staff of the Authority. Where private planes only are involved the public interest is obviously less than in the case of accidents to common carriers licensed to serve the public generally. But private accidents are nevertheless carefully studied, both individually to determine blame, if any, and statistically to determine dangerous trends of practice that may be altered by amendments to the regulations or otherwise.

THE ONLY WAY TO FLY IS TO KNOW HOW TO FLY SAFELY AND TO FLY NO OTHER WAY

Disciplinary measures against pilots, from air-line pilots to students, have already been carried out as a result of investigations by the Air Safety Board. Changes in construction details of several widely used types of airplanes have been brought about. But the members of the Air Safety Board and of the Authority have expressed the belief that, more important than all of this detailed work in the already observable improvement of civil aviation's safety record, has been the knowledge of all connected with civil flying that a constant, skillful pressure is being exerted by experts to show beyond doubt that the only way to fly is to know how to fly safely, and to fly no other way.

This steady, intelligent pressure for safety has already borne results. I have cited the magnificent record of the air lines, already so fruitful in the production of new business. I am happy to be able to tell you that already the records show that fatalities are steadily decreasing, despite the fact that there has been a steady and large increase of flying both on the scheduled air lines and among the private flyers.

And all of this we can credit to moral effect. The real measures taken to increase safety in private flying have not yet even begun to be felt.

NOTED PILOTS HERE TO FIGHT SAFETY PERIL—AVIATORS OF 11 AIR LINES LAUNCH LOBBY TO SAVE LIVES

(By Edmond Monk)

Convinced that defeat of the Presidential plan to abolish the Air Safety Board and transfer the C. A. A. to the Department of Commerce is vital to the future of American aviation, famous pilots of the Nation moved into the Capital yesterday to confront Congress with a second lobby to save lives.

From 11 of the Nation's leading air lines came uniformed flyers representing 1,500 pilots. In chorus they voiced their fears that adoption of President Roosevelt's proposal would seriously menace safety of millions of Americans who travel by air.

NEW ATTACK IN SENATE

The first lobby to save lives, the flyers explained, was partially aimed at setting up the C. A. A. and their Air Safety Board. It is to hold this ground gained that they are here today, they said.

Meanwhile the Senate yesterday echoed with a new attack on the President's proposal as time for a show-down appeared set for late this week.

Senator HARRY TRUMAN (Democrat), of Missouri, told the Senate that adoption of the proposal of the President would result in a serious blow to aviation; he praised the record of the two agencies. He cited particularly the record of no fatal accidents on air lines for more than a year.

Senator PAT MCCARRAN (Democrat), of Nevada, will arrive in Washington today. A bitter foe of the President's latest reorganization plan, the Nevadan is expected immediately to map lines of battle against the proposal.

M'CARRAN MAPS FIGHT

Senator BENNETT C. CLARK, Democrat, of Missouri, charged that the old Bureau of Air Commerce was saturated with politics which prevented its effective operation in promotion of air safety.

Under the old system, he said, United States Senators were killed in air crashes. His reference was believed to be to the death of former Senator Bronson Cutting, of New Mexico, several years ago in an airplane crash.

Representing 1,500 highly trained pilots on American passenger and mail lines, the 11 flyers were unanimously outspoken in protest against the change in status of the Air Safety Board and the C. A. A.

MENACE TO FLYING PUBLIC

Several of the flyers testified at hearings which led to creation of the safety agency and the C. A. A. All said they believed a change as proposed would constitute a step backward and a menace to the air-traveling public.

Today the second "lobby to save lives" will move on Capitol Hill, where a large number of legislators will be contacted by the pilots. The group will also gather with Senator MCCARRAN some time today.

"I certainly do not think the American public desires a return to the crash-ridden days when the Department of Commerce regulated aeronautics," said Art Mills, veteran pilot of 1,250,000 miles of passenger travel.

WARNS OF TRAGEDY

Representing pilots of the Braniff Airways, flying from the Great Lake points to the Gulf of Mexico, Mills said:

"If the proposal goes through we will have a recurrence of the tragic situation which occurred when the air-mail contracts were canceled in 1934 and the Army detailed to fly the mail. Then there were 66 crashes, and 12 pilots lost their lives in less than 2 months."

Ray T. Elsmore, Western Air Express pilot, with 12,000 hours as a passenger-transport pilot, was equally emphatic in his protest.

EMPHATIC AGAINST CHANGE

Twenty-two years in aviation, a World War flier, and commander of the 329th Observation Squadron, Army Air Reserves, Elsmore said:

"We know of the many fatal accidents under the old Department of Commerce supervision. The present proposal would put the airlines under regulations similar to the former status. Why make a change which statistics and records show would effect a menace to the air traveling public?"

D. W. Ledbetter, American Airlines, 12 years' experience and 12,500 air hours, and now flying the New York-to-New Orleans trip:

"Hard facts and statistics prove that it would be impossible to improve on the perfect record for safety that the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Air Safety Board have brought about in the aviation field. We're not just assuming the efficiency of the board and the C. A. A. records prove our case."

H. L. Smith, Pennsylvania Central Airlines, who has 9,000 hours and flies the Washington-Detroit trip, said:

"It represents very definitely a backward movement. It will make air travel more hazardous. I think it would be well to maintain the status quo. The record speaks for itself."

James H. Roe, T. W. A. flyer, with 10,000 hours and who flies the Kansas City-New York trip:

"We pilots are not concerned so much for our own safety, but for the public whose lives are in our hands. Nearly three million passengers will be carried by air this year. It is our obvious duty to oppose Reorganization Plan No. IV."

C. F. Luethi, Northwest Airlines, naval reserve aviator, flying the route from Minneapolis to Billings, Mont., 10,000 hours:

EXPANSION ENDANGERED

"I am carrying on for 'Cash' Chamberlain, who was here with the first 'Lobby to Save Lives.' Shortly after creation of the C. A. A. and the safety board—but before their effect could be felt—'Cash' crashed to his death near Miles City, Mont. The need for greatest safety regulation, such as now provided, cannot be overemphasized."

R. C. Young, Eastern Airlines, 9,000 hours, pilot on the New York-Miami trip:

"The air lines now are on the verge of the greatest expansion program yet undertaken as a result of the increase in public confidence. This was brought about through the splendid safety record set up under C. A. A. and A. S. B. regulations. Under the expansion plans many of the giant 4-motored planes carrying 42 passengers will be utilized. If we ever needed rigid safety regulation it will be from now on."

"Hi" Little, United Air Lines, 12,000 hours, New York-to-Chicago pilot:

"I was a member of the first 'Lobby to Save Lives.' The results of the legislation we advocated then have been far above our highest hopes."

"DEFINITE BACKWARD STEP"

G. E. Rodieck, Mid-Continent Air Lines, 7,000 hours, who pilots the Tulsa-Minneapolis flight:

"We pilots here in Washington today speak for practically all of the Nation's passenger-line pilots. In the interest of the public's safety we hope to convince Senators and Representatives that Reorganization Plan No. IV represents a definite step backward in aviation."

Gilbert Blackmore, Pan American Airways, former Navy aviator with 9,000 hours of passenger flying, now a pilot of the American Clipper flight from New York to Lisbon, Portugal:

"Preservation of safe conditions is vital to air transportation, especially long-distance flying such as the Clipper transoceanic routes. The C. A. A. and the Air Safety Board have done an excellent job, so why turn backward?"

RECALLS PILOT'S DEATH

S. H. Hopkins, Chicago and Southern Airlines, 6,500 hours, pilot on the New Orleans-to-Chicago passenger hop:

"All pilots of the Chicago and Southern strongly protest against Reorganization Plan No. IV. For the past year it has been a pleasure not to buy funeral flowers for some pilot every 28 days."

F. D. ASSAILS AIR SAFETY CAMPAIGN—IGNORANCE, POLITICS BEHIND ATTACK ON SHIFT, HE SAYS

(By John O'Donnell and Doris Fleeson)

With a blast of caustic language at his critics charging that ignorance, gullibility, or politics were behind their attacks, President Roosevelt flatly declared yesterday that he was standing behind his reorganization order which will place the Civil Aeronautics Authority under the Department of Commerce and abolish the three-man Air Safety Board.

In a prepared statement read at his press conference, the President declared that "a flood of misinformation" has been poured out recently against his reorganization of Federal machinery to control aviation.

SAYS SAFETY'S NOT IMPAIRED

He charged that "particular groups in selfish protection of their own special interests" had arisen in protest against the White House plan which, said Mr. Roosevelt, will promote "efficiency and economy" and in no way impair or slow down the promotion of safety in the air.

The President's language, in his prepared statement and later in his answers to reporters' questions, was vigorous, to say the least. Much of the "misinformation" spread by opponents of the reorganization plan, said the President, "has fallen of its own absurdity and needs no comment."

The President was especially critical of the present Air Safety Board. The problems confronting the present set-up of the five-member Authority, the Administrator, and the Safety Board "were intensified by friction, particularly in the Air Safety Board," Mr. Roosevelt declared in his statement.

"FIGHTING ALL DAY LONG"

In discussion, he went even farther and charged that the three members of the Safety Board were fighting each other all day long.

A return blast of sarcasm was hurled at the President by a spokesman for the Safety Board who pointed out that the board since last fall has been functioning with only two members—Chairman Thomas Hardin and C. B. Allen.

The third member, Sumpter Smith, resigned to become chairman of the Inter-Departmental Engineering Committee which is building the huge ultramodern airport at Gravelly Point to replace the pocket-size Hoover Field.

The President declared his reorganization plan would have five advantages over the present set-up:

1. The Federal aviation program will be placed in the Department of Commerce where it will have closer relationship with the Weather Bureau and the air navigation chart service of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. By coming under the Commerce Department it will have representation at "the Cabinet table for a program of basic significance to national transportation and our national defense. Present world conditions make the merit of this phase of the proposal obvious."

2. The present five-member authority remains an independent unit, performing regulatory functions, appointing its own personnel, submitting its own budget.

3. The shift will eliminate "the blind spot" created by the original act which did not distinguish clearly between the functions of the administrator and the authority.

WOULD GIVE LAW TEETH

4. The new Civil Aeronautics Board will have power to enforce safety regulations whereas the present Safety Board "is helpless" to take positive steps to prevent recurrence of accidents.

5. "Appreciable savings" will be realized with "several highly paid positions on the Air Safety Board eliminated."

The text of the President's prepared statement follows:

"Since the transmittal of Reorganization Plans Nos. III and IV, a flood of misinformation has engulfed those sections dealing with the Civil Aeronautics Authority. Much of this has fallen of its own absurdity and needs no comment. This morning, however, we saw a group of well-intentioned people staking out an exclusive claim to a so-called Lobby to Save Lives.

ANSWER COMPELLED

"The implication that we are not interested in saving lives, which is certainly contradicted by the record of our progress in civil aviation during recent years, compels me to restate in simple terms the basic features of the reorganization plans affecting the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

"I might say here that everybody is for the abstract idea of reorganization in the interest of increased efficiency and economy. However, there is a rather discouraging collapse of enthusiasm when concrete proposals are made. In selfish protection of their own special interests we always find particular groups who hitherto favored reorganization arising in protest.

STUDY LASTED 5 MONTHS

"As it now stands, there are three agencies—the Civil Aeronautics Five-Member Authority, the Administrator, and the Air Safety Board—all autonomous groups, none of them represented at the Cabinet table. The inherent problems confronting them were intensified by friction, particularly within the Air Safety Board.

"For 5 months the administrative management division of the Budget Bureau made a study at my request of the operation of the Authority. It became obvious that a change was imperative if we were to continue to move forward in civil aviation.

"Here, in simple summary, is the proposal:

"1. Despite handicaps, the Federal program for civil aeronautics has now achieved a stature and an importance which justify bringing this program more closely into the Federal family. The proposal will place it within the framework of the Department of Commerce, where it will have a closer relationship with the important reporting services of the Weather Bureau and the essential air-navigation chart service of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. More than that, it will provide representation at the Cabinet table for a program of basic significance to our national transportation and our national defense. Present world conditions make the merit of this phase of the proposal obvious.

"2. The present five-member Authority which has received such widespread praise remains as an independent civil aeronautics board performing the basic regulatory functions. It will continue to appoint and control its own personnel and submit its own budget.

"3. Certain of the Authority's functions are transferred to the administrator to eliminate a blind spot created by the failure of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 to carry out the intention of Congress to distinguish clearly between the functions of the Administrator and the Authority.

"4. The function of investigating accidents is transferred to the Civil Aeronautics Board which, unlike the present Air Safety Board, will not be helpless to take positive steps toward preventing the recurrence of accidents. Unlike the Air Safety Board, the Civil Aeronautics Board will have the power to prescribe air safety rules, regulations, and standards, and to suspend or revoke certificates after hearing. Not only does this continue the present independence of accident investigation, but it also makes possible prompt translation of findings into corrective action.

"5. Not only are we advancing the cause of air safety by these changes but we will also realize appreciable savings. Several highly paid positions on the Air Safety Board will be eliminated and other economies made possible."

THE PRESIDENT ON AIR SAFETY—TEXT OF STATEMENT—HE REPLIES TO CRITICS

Since the transmittal of Reorganization Plans Nos. III and IV a flood of misinformation has engulfed those sections dealing with the Civil Aeronautics Authority. Much of this has fallen of its own absurdity and needs no comment. This morning, however, we saw a group of well-intentioned people staking out an exclusive claim to a so-called lobby to save lives.

The implication that we are not interested in saving lives, which is certainly contradicted by the record of our progress in civil aviation during recent years, compels me to restate in simple terms the basic features of the reorganization plans affecting the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

I might say here that everybody is for the abstract idea of reorganization in the interest of increased efficiency and economy. However, there is a rather discouraging collapse of enthusiasm when concrete proposals are made. In selfish protection of their own special interests we always find particular groups who hitherto favored reorganization arising in protest.

As it now stands, there are three agencies—the Civil Aeronautics (five member) Authority, the Administrator, and the Air Safety Board—all autonomous groups, none of them represented at the Cabinet table. The inherent problems confronting them were intensified by friction, particularly within the Air Safety Board. For 5 months the Administrative Management Division of the Budget Bureau made a study, at my request, of the operation of the Authority. It became obvious that a change was imperative if we were to continue to move forward in civil aviation. Here, in simple summary, is the proposal:

1. Despite handicaps, the Federal program for civil aeronautics has now achieved a stature and an importance which justify bringing this program more closely into the Federal family. The proposal will place it within the framework of the Department of Commerce, where it will have a closer relationship with the important reporting services of the Weather Bureau and the essential air-navigation-chart service of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. More than that, it will provide representation at the Cabinet table for a program of basic significance to our national transportation and our national defense.

2. The present five-member Authority, which has received such widespread praise, remains as an independent Civil Aeronautics Board performing the basic regulatory functions. It will continue to appoint and control its own personnel and submit its own budget.

3. Certain of the Authority's functions are transferred to the Administrator to eliminate a blind spot created by the failure of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 to carry out the intention of Congress to distinguish clearly between the functions of the Administrator and the Authority.

4. The function of investigating accidents is transferred to the Civil Aeronautics Board which, unlike the present Air Safety Board, will not be helpless to take positive steps toward preventing the recurrence of accidents. Unlike the Air Safety Board, the Civil Aeronautics Board will have the power to prescribe air-safety rules, regulations, and standards, and to suspend or revoke certificates after hearing. Not only does this continue the present independence of accident investigation, but it also makes possible prompt translation of findings into corrective action.

5. Not only are we advancing the cause of air safety by these changes, but we will also realize appreciable savings. Several highly paid positions on the Air Safety Board will be eliminated and other economies made possible.

POSITION OF THE AIR-LINE PILOTS OF THE NATION IN OPPOSITION TO THE PRESIDENT'S REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. IV, WHICH PROPOSES TO ABOLISH THE AIR SAFETY BOARD AND STRIP THE NEW AIR AUTHORITY OF ITS IDENTITY AND INDEPENDENCE AND RETURN THE CONTROL OF CIVIL AERONAUTICS AND AIR TRANSPORTATION TO ITS FORMER EXTREMELY UNSATISFACTORY CONTROL BY THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

In this day and age so many startling things are constantly happening that we have become accustomed to the unusual, and we are not easily startled or aroused. The air-line pilots, due to the nature of their work, are not easily excitable, yet only a few days ago when the President announced his fourth reorganization plan, abolishing the Air Safety Board and stripping the new Air Authority of its identity and independence, and proposed that air accident investigations and civil air regulation generally be placed back under the Department of Commerce, the pilots were not only startled but they were utterly flabbergasted. The regulation of air transportation and civil aviation by the Department of Commerce is something that the pilots, in fact almost everyone in the industry, look back upon with abhorrence. It is not even a pleasant story to recount. Crash upon crash, needless sacrificing of human life. From the late twenties to the time that the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 was passed are black pages in the history of our country's air transportation development.

FACTS ESTABLISHED BY STARK REALITIES

It is not a matter of suppositions, assumptions, or the preponderance of vaguely defined ideas, but what this amounts to is cold, hard, indisputable facts; facts established by stark realities; facts established by the loss of score upon score of human lives and the loss of millions upon millions of dollars to pay for the crash and damage suit costs.

On May 6, 1935, Senator Bronson Cutting lost his life in an air-line crash. In sheer desperation the pilots started to lead the fight to free America's air transportation from the entwining tentacles of death in the air which was strangling it to ruin.

During the period that the Department of Commerce regulated the country's air transportation network 473 persons lost their lives in air crashes of whom 146 were air-line pilots. The ranks of the air-line pilots were being thinned at the startling rate of one every 28 days. Their passengers were meeting death averaging one every 15 days. The crash-scared public was afraid to ride, which resulted in inestimably large losses of revenue to the industry, and progress was stymied.

AIR-MINDED SENATORS AND CONGRESSMEN

Air-minded Congressmen and Senators became interested. A Senatorial Air Investigation Committee was appointed, namely, Senators Clark, Missouri; White, Maine; Donahey, Ohio; and the late Royal S. Copeland, New York. The pilots have always felt that the many grueling, worrisome hours that Senator Copeland put in on the job of investigating air safety with the view of eliminating the many terrible air crashes that were constantly occurring, and his work on air-safety legislation hastened his death.

The record built up by this committee is truly a bible on air safety. The politically involved and obviously faulty regulatory and air accident investigating procedure of the Department of Commerce is all written in the record of this senatorial Air Safety Investigating Committee.

Congress, the line pilots, and everyone else that was really interested in doing something about increasing air safety, worked tirelessly and relentlessly until in 1938 the new Civil Aeronautics Act was passed. The pilots had repeatedly pointed out through these dark years that the solution to the problem was not only to remove the control of civil aeronautics from the Department of Commerce, but also to separate the functions of regulating civil aeronautics from the functions of investigating accidents and making recommendations as to what should be done to prevent reoccurrences. The pilots pointed out simply that no one agency could reasonably be expected to handle both functions efficiently and effectively because no one agency can be expected to decide against itself when something happens.

PILOTS RECOMMENDED AIR SAFETY BOARD

The line pilots recommended the creation of an Air Safety Board, which was to be completely independent of the regulation-making divisions of the Authority. The sole duty of this Board being, without influence of any kind, to investigate accidents with the view of preventing reoccurrences and to make recommendations to the Authority which would, in the opinion of this Board, tend to prevent accidents and increase air safety.

Congress listened, and the Air Safety Board and the new Air Authority were created.

Now let's look at the record since the Air Safety Board took over. Accidents have been cut to a minimum, and there has not been a pilot death on our country's air lines in the past 16 months, nor a passenger fatality in more than 12 months. A world air-safety record. During this 12-month period the pilots that are making the appeal to Congress not to permit the abolishment of the Air Safety Board flew 87,325,145 miles and carried 2,028,817 passengers without a fatality. Contrast this to one pilot being killed every 28 days and 1 passenger every 15 days, for the entire period that the Department of Commerce regulated civil aeronautics and investigated accidents, numbering a total of 473 pilots and passengers killed.

Certainly no one wishes to go back to that. The pilots are not quarreling with anybody. All they are trying to do is a good job so that American air transportation may continue to be No. 1 in world flying.

CONGRESS CREATED THE CIVIL AERONAUTICS ACT

When Congress created the Civil Aeronautics Act bringing into being the Air Safety Board it won with one stroke the confidence of the American people and they took to the air. Real air safety has been established by the Air Safety Board with the cooperation of the new Authority. This combination is paying dividends in lives saved and thousands upon thousands of dollars saved because of not having to pay the cost of crashes. Contrast this with the millions earned due to increased patronage resulting from the no-fatality safety record that has just been established, and we have only just started. It is only plain common sense to want to leave well enough alone.

There is only one way to create and maintain a maximum degree of air safety. The Federal functions of regulating civil aeronautics and accident investigation duties and responsibilities, and the making of air-safety recommendations to prevent reoccurrences must be definitely and completely independent. For example, a regulatory agency such as the old Bureau of Air Commerce, Department of Commerce, functioned in the following manner: First, the Bureau made the regulations, approved the engineering, installed and maintained the navigation aids, and then when an accident occurred it sat as a judge and jury to decide as to the efficiency of its own activities. No man can be expected to decide a case against himself. This is, in the opinion of the pilots, the principal and fundamental underlying reason why there were so many crashes and so much loss of life during the period that the Department of Commerce regulated commercial aeronautics and civil air transportation, and is one of the principal reasons why it made such a bad flop of the entire situation.

AIR SAFETY BOARD

If we are to have real air safety the functions of making the regulations governing civil aeronautics and civil air transportation must be definitely separated. During the accident-ridden period that the Department of Commerce regulated civil aeronautics the pilots made a thorough study of the problem. The idea of separating the regulatory functions of civil air regulation from the functions of investigating accidents and making safety recommendations to the regulation-making agency was first recommended when the line pilots testified before Senator Copeland's congressional Air Safety Investigating Committee during 1936. At that time the move was being sponsored to place the regulatory control of civil aeronautics under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. While testifying, the air-line pilots made the following recommendation, which was the first time that the Air Safety Board idea was advocated. It was then referred to as the Bureau of Air Safety:

"This proposed Bureau of Air Safety should concern itself with nothing but inspection and the very important problems of properly safeguarding safety in the air. In other words, the function of the Bureau of Air Safety would have to do entirely with answering the one question, 'Is it safe?' And if it is not safe, it is not sound.

"In other words, in air transportation, no matter what the advancements or developments are, if they are not safe they are not sound."

AIR-LINE PILOTS' ARTICLE IN LIBERTY

In an article written by the air-line pilots published in the May 15, 1937, issue of Liberty, the idea of separating the regulation-making functions of the civil air regulatory agency from the functions of investigating accidents and making air-safety recommendations to prevent reoccurrences was again advanced. Following is an excerpt from this article:

"The real price of pioneering has always been, not dollars and cents, but human life. Threescore and nine pilots have sacrificed their lives in the last 5 years to give to our country the swiftest of all modes of transportation, the potentialities of which in speed, safety, and reliability are beyond reckoning.

"The air-line pilots have long been of the opinion that air transportation should be lifted out of the Bureau of Air Commerce of the Department of Commerce. The pilots point out that within the to be created air transportation regulatory agency there should be created a five-man Air Safety Board, the members of which will be properly fitted, thoroughly experienced, and carefully selected career men, and not political appointees. The sole purpose of the Air Safety Board should be to safeguard the air-traveling public. This is the air-line pilots' answer to the question, How can we increase air safety?

"Such legislation is now before Congress, and, if passed, the American public may look forward to a phenomenal improvement in air safety."

SIXTY-SEVEN PERSONS LOST IN AIR CRASHES, 1935–36—NOT ONE LIFE LOST IN 1938–39

That article was written immediately after the winter months of 1935–36, during which 67 persons lost their lives in air crashes. Sixteen of this startling number were from the ranks of the air-line pilots. About this time Congress began taking serious note of the situation and started to work on legislation to lift the control of civil flying and air transportation out of the old, inefficient, politically involved, and highly unsatisfactory control by the Department of Commerce, to which the President is now proposing that it be returned. It is significant to note that the prediction in the Liberty article captioned "Why these airplane crashes": "Such legislation is now before Congress, and, if passed, the American public may look forward to a phenomenal improvement in air safety." That phenomenal improvement has become a reality. The record of safe performance since the Air Safety Board took over speaks for itself. There have been no fatalities in air transportation for almost 13 months. The actual record is 87,325,145 miles flown and 2,028,817 passengers carried without a single fatality to pilot or passenger.

AN INDEPENDENT AIR SAFETY BOARD

It is a foregone conclusion that a Federal safety agency, whether it be one pertaining to air safety or any other form of safety, would never be without enemies, and some very bitter enemies, because to fix the blame for accidents without fear or favor always involves treading on somebody's toes. Nevertheless, the pilots have long recommended and know absolutely that there will never be real air safety unless a Federal agency, such as the Air Safety Board, is maintained free of all influences of every nature whatsoever in the frank and fearless performance of the duties of fixing the blame when an air accident occurs. There is no better proof of accomplishment than a good record of performance, and such proof has been undeniably established.

The Air Safety Board, since it took over less than 2 years ago, has honestly and fearlessly sought out the true causes of the air-line accidents that have occurred and the contribution that this has made to the increasing of air safety is undeniable and is proven by the record.

AIR SAFETY INVOLVES EXPENDITURE OF LARGE SUMS OF MONEY

Another fact that should not be lost sight of in a problem of this kind is the terrific amount of pressure that a truly effective air-safety agency must constantly withstand, because the carrying out of their recommendations may involve the expenditure of large sums of money. Such expenditures always pay large dividends, but unless there is an agency, such as the Air Safety Board, that definitely calls a spade a spade as to what is safe or not safe, those who do not have their lives at stake, as do the pilots and their passengers, are not interested or vitally concerned with our problem of safety or our demands for safety control. The old adage, "A stitch in time saves nine," is promptly pooh-poohed.

Instead of first determining the facts and then facing them squarely everyone concerned immediately starts hiding behind alibis, blaming others, and instead of really learning what caused the accident it ends up in a mud-slinging campaign and very little if anything is accomplished to prevent recurrence, and the bewildered public becomes afraid to travel by air. The blame is usually shifted and misplaced and, when it is all said and done, nothing has been contributed to increasing air safety or to prevent recurrences. This is a short-sighted policy and in the end is very costly, not only in human life, but in the needless expenditure of millions and millions of dollars to pay for the cost of accidents and damage suits, to say nothing of many more millions of dollars lost because of lost patronage from a crash-scared public. This could not possibly have been more convincingly proven than it was by the Department of Commerce when it made such a marked failure of regulating civil aeronautics and investigating accidents the cost of which was, in addition to countless millions of dollars, 473 lives. Certainly no one who really knows the facts wishes to return to that.

PILOTS AND PASSENGERS COME FIRST

There are two parties that have a vital interest in this situation; they are the ones who have their lives at stake—the pilots and their passengers. Unless the two join forces in forceful opposition to the President's attempt to abolish the Air Safety Board and strip the Authority of its identity and independence, the President's plan to return civil air-regulation control and the highly important function of independent air-accident investigation back to its former control by the Department of Commerce will become the law of the land. The history of the politically involved, inefficient, and ineffectual control of air transportation under this Department of the Government is well known. It is only common sense to take the position, "Let's not go back to that."

[From the Washington Times-Herald of May 1, 1940]

PILOTS' CHIEF ANSWERS FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT ON AIR SAFETY—FACTS, NOT POLITICS, BROUGHT FIGHT ON SHIFT, BEHNCKE SAYS

Following President Roosevelt's statement assailing those who oppose his plan to abolish the Air Safety Board and transfer the Civil Aeronautics Authority back to the Department of Commerce, Capt. David L. Behncke, president of the Air Line Pilots Association, last night issued a statement defending his organization's stand in the matter.

Referring to the President's reference to "a so-called lobby to save lives," Captain Behncke said:

"The pilots are not in Washington to enter into controversy with the President or anyone else. They are here in the interest of saving lives.

NOT SCHOOLED IN POLITICS

"They are not schooled in politics. They are schooled in flying and know what is necessary to make air transportation safe. They learned about this the hard way. One hundred and forty-six of their number met death in air crashes while the Department of Commerce had control of civil flying and air transportation. There were 130 fatal air-line crashes and 146 pilots, 279 passengers, and 48 stewardesses and other nonrevenue passengers—a total of 573 persons—were killed during this period.

"The pilots, the industry, and, I am sure, the air traveling public do not want aviation put back under control of the Government Department that made this kind of a record. Stripped to the bone, this is the issue.

"The pilots have not implied lack of interest on the part of anyone in saving lives. On the contrary, that is what the argument is about.

TELLS MAKE-UP OF "LOBBY"

"Let us not forget that the world's air-safety record which is being eulogized was not made when the Department of Commerce regulated civil flying.

"The so-called 'lobby to save lives' is made up of 11 veterans of the airways who represent the pilots that have established the world's air-safety record which passed the milestone of a year's perfect performance on March 26, 1940. To set this record they flew 87,325,145 miles and carried 2,028,817 passengers without a single fatality. Since that date they have added another month of unblemished performance to this record.

MILLION-MILE PILOTS

"This group, now in Washington pleading for the preservation of the Air Safety Board and the independence of the new Civil Aeronautics Authority, is made up almost entirely of million-mile pilots. They are pleading with their Representatives and Senators because they know that Congress was right when it passed the Civil Aeronautics Act in 1938.

"They know that the greatest single factor in bringing about present safety in flying has been the Air Safety Board. Can they be blamed for not wanting to turn back to the old order? Certainly they should know.

PUT FAITH IN CONGRESS

"It was not until this protection was granted by Congress that crashes diminished and then ceased. These are the men that have faith that Congress will not reverse itself and let civil aviation go back to control by the Department of Commerce.

"They are not alone in their position. It is unanimous. The entire industry is asking with one voice, 'Why not leave well enough alone?' To this voice is being added that of the air traveling public because where lives are involved, people have a long memory.

NOT POLITICS—JUST FACTS

"We are told that abolition of the Air Safety Board and the transfer of an emasculated authority to the Department of Commerce is proposed in the name of efficiency and economy. What it all adds up to is to destroy the Air Safety Board and the independence of the new air Authority that together have brought a new, struggling industry out of a period of terrible chaos, the record of which has been blazed across hundreds of pages of legislative Air-Safety Investigating Committee records and unforgettably imprinted on the minds of the American people.

"It would place the situation right back where we started from under the control of the politically involved Department of Commerce. Need more be said? It is not politics as far as the pilots are concerned. It is facts—irrefutable facts involving the preservation of human life."

[From the Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald of April 29, 1940]

WHY TAKE A CHANCE?

Flying low and blind into heavy weather, a transcontinental transport plane came scudding East into the dawn of May 6, 1935, on the regular run between Albuquerque, N. Mex., and Kansas City, Mo., with 13 people aboard.

It was an hour behind schedule, and the radio was not working very well. Only 30 minutes of gasoline were in the tanks. The pilot finally got through to the weather information service furnished civil aviation by the Federal Government, and was told he would find a clear ceiling at Kirksville, Mo., where there was an emergency landing field.

He put his rudder over and banked through the fog toward where he thought Kirksville was. The left wing snagged a tree, turned the plane into snarling cartwheel, and hurtled it into a road bank 16 miles south of Kirksville, which, contrary to what the pilot had been told, was smothered in fog.

Four persons, including the pilot, were killed instantly. One more died shortly thereafter. Eight were badly hurt.

IT TOOK A SENATOR'S DEATH TO ROUSE THE SENATE

There was only one exceptional fact about this crash, for it was otherwise only another in a succession that lasted from 1933 to 1939. The exceptional fact was that the late Senator Bronson Cutting, of New Mexico, had boarded the plane at Albuquerque and so had died on the road bank.

Citizens had been petitioning the Congress to do something about civil aviation ever since President Roosevelt, in 1933, had canceled the air-mail contracts and then restored them after a disastrous interlude that nearly wrecked the Army Air Corps. Civil aviation had never really recovered from that episode. But Congress still would not act.

Senator Cutting's death changed all that. Members of Congress came to realize that what had been happening to people whose names meant nothing could also happen to them. The reaction was exactly that of a policeman who sees another policeman shot.

Congressional investigations followed for a year.

AIR BUREAU WAS JUDGE, JURY, AND PROSECUTOR OF ITSELF

It was demonstrated that the Bureau of Air Commerce, in the Department of Commerce, was being saddled with an impossible assignment to make the rules for civil aviation, enforce them, and then punish anybody whose neglect should cause a failure of service. The Bureau was prosecutor, judge, and jury, not merely toward the aviation industry but toward itself as well.

In consequence, it was a subservient creature of the Secretary of Commerce and the complete victim of rascally politics. Civil aviation was teetering into bankruptcy. Public confidence was shattered.

To correct this terrible condition, Congress took control of aviation away from the Department of Commerce and set up an independent agency, the Civil Aeronautics Authority. Within the Authority, it provided an Air Safety Board.

The Board had just one duty—to investigate all accidents involving civil aircraft, and publish its findings as to responsibility. It was free to criticize the C. A. A., Congress, the air lines, the pilots, the plane manufacturers. Anybody.

The C. A. A. and the Board went into action on August 8, 1938. They made the aviation business stable and successful. On March 27, 1940, the industry could and proudly did celebrate the passing of 1 full year free of disaster. Not a single life had been lost in the air-transport business, yet the industry had progressed technically and was fulfilling more schedules at faster speed than ever before.

YOU MAY SAVE LIVES BY SAVING THE C. A. A.

On April 11, 1940, the President's fourth plan for the reorganization of the executive branch of the Government provided that the independent Civil Aeronautics Authority and the independent Air Safety Board be abolished.

Their functions would be telescoped into the Department of Commerce under control of the Secretary. And the civil aviation business would be right back where it was in 1935 when Senator Cutting was killed.

This reorganization program comes before Congress soon for ratification. There is no merit in the proposal to wreck the C. A. A. It is doing a good job.

Members of Congress, remember Senator Cutting. You have corrected the conditions which brought him death. You have an opportunity to return to those conditions or to preserve the present safer way of flying.

Why take a chance? Save the C. A. A. and the Safety Board. You have every reason to say that you will save human life by doing so.

Mr. McCARRAN obtained the floor.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK of Idaho in the chair). Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, at his press conference on Tuesday of this week, the President commented upon the flood of criticism which has swept the country concerning the proposed reorganization of the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

He is reported in the press to have stated that this criticism has been based upon gullibility, ignorance, and politics.

At an earlier date he had referred to such criticism as "spinach."

Thus, to brand the critics of this reorganization as gullible, ignorant, and political is to protest too much.

I will venture to say that no one is more soundly versed in aeronautical matters than are the two Senators from Missouri, each of whom has roundly scored the proposed reorganization.

The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] actively and diligently served on the Copeland committee in the inquiries growing out of the tragic death of the beloved Senator Cutting, and delved deeply into the operations of the old Bureau of Air Commerce. He laid bare the grievous faults of that politics-ridden agency.

The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] conducted exhaustive hearings in 1935, 1937, and 1938 into the entire matter of the regulation and development of civil aeronautics when my bills for regulating aeronautics were before the Senate, and wrote two notable reports on the subject.

Nor need Representative LEA of California, the chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, bow to others in his knowledge and appreciation of the problems of civil aeronautics. He, too, vigorously opposes the proposed reorganization. Since 1919 he has been an active student of civil aeronautics, and in 1937 and 1938 presided over extensive hearings into the subject, joining with me as the coauthor of the Civil Aeronautics Act.

Can deliberate criticism made by these gentlemen temperately be branded as gulliible or ignorant? Can they be accused of playing politics?

The criticism of the reorganization was correctly described by the President in his prepared statement as a flood. It is a flood, growing irresistibly hour by hour. Throughout the land not only the aviation journals but the daily press have protested this proposal. I have yet to have brought to my attention a single comment in the press in favor of the proposal.

The general public, too, has been writing letters and petitioning for the disapproval of this measure. I have yet to see a single expression from them approving the proposal.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I have been impressed by the fact that the pilots who have come down here, distinguished pilots, nationally outstanding pilots, men known all over the world, are unanimous in their support of the able Senator's outstanding bill. Everyone that I know anything about, connected with the aviation industry, takes the same position.

Mr. McCARRAN. I thank the Senator from Minnesota for the reminder he has given me. I was just about to dwell on that subject.

The pilots, those brave men, representing the very flower of our young manhood, who gave many—far too many—of their lives during the days of chaotic regulation by the old Bureau of Air Commerce, likewise unanimously condemn the proposed reorganization. And they have been supported in their stand by Mr. Green, the president of the American Federation of Labor, as disclosed by a letter which I inserted in the RECORD earlier today.

The mechanics, the radio operators, the dispatchers likewise have expressed themselves in no uncertain terms as opposed to the proposed change.

The air lines themselves, which have endured the incompetence of the old order and have at last begun to achieve, under the Authority, the stability and progress they have so badly needed, unanimously advise us that the reorganization would be a serious mistake.

I may say, Mr. President, that those who have invested hundreds of millions of dollars in the industry represented by the air lines are wondering about their investments in this facility which has accomplished so much, for their investments are now being jeopardized.

The Railway Express Agency, handling the great and growing air-express business, and organizations representing the private and miscellaneous fliers the country over, all plead for the preservation of the present regime.

Are all these—the press, the public, the air-line pilots and management, mechanics, radio men, dispatchers, and all the other aeronautical agencies, and even the American Federation of Labor—to be brushed aside with the heated charge that they are ignorant, that they are gullible, or that they are playing politics?

What, pray, have the air-line pilots and management to gain from playing politics in opposition to the President? No other industry today is so directly affected by government. No other industry has cooperated more wholeheartedly with government. No other industry has been so generous in its praise of the President and the Government. No other industry is more concerned with safety, efficiency, and economy, both of its own operations and of governmental regulation.

In his prepared statement the President lists five reasons for the proposed change in the Civil Aeronautics Authority, and its Administrator and Air Safety Board. Let us examine them one by one.

I

First, it is said that to shift civil aeronautics into the Department will (a) give it representation at the Cabinet table, and (b) give it a closer relationship with the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Weather Bureau.

(a) As to representation at the Cabinet table, what did civil aeronautics gain from such representation prior to 1938? For all those years it was represented aplenty. It was almost represented to death. It was so effectively represented that America was on the verge of losing its proud position of leadership in civil aeronautics. Our railroads, our merchant marine, and our motor carriers are not so represented.

The truth of the matter is that the proposal is that civil aeronautics will be so completely represented by the Secretary of Commerce that the new Civil Aeronautics Board, under the express terms of the proposed change, will be unable to report either to the President or to Congress except through the Secretary of Commerce. He will have the sole voice. The Civil Aeronautics Authority will lose the independent voice which Congress gave it in 1938. The President will have closed his ears to the Authority, and will have shut it off from communication with Congress. It will be a subordinate bureau, able to speak only through the Secretary.

It was this subordination, whereby its affairs are lost in the extensive business of a large executive department, which made its representation at the Cabinet table so ineffectual prior to the passage of the Civil Aeronautics Act. It was the need to give civil aeronautics a voice which could be heard directly, to give it the position and prestige it merits, which led the Congress to terminate the old and inadequate bureau status and put it on an independent basis. Under the present act, the agency regulating civil aeronautics can speak out directly to the President, to the State Department, to the War Department, to the Post Office Department, and last but not least, to the Congress of the United States. Under the reorganization it will be subordinated and silenced, and once more its affairs will be noticed only at the pleasure of a busy Secretary of Commerce. Once more civil aeronautics will be at the mercy of the conflicting demands upon the time of a single man—the very fault which so painfully afflicted it under the old Bureau of Air Commerce.

(b) As to the reasons for choosing the Department of Commerce, we now learn that this will give civil aeronautics a closer relationship with the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Weather Bureau. Since the Weather Bureau is presently in the Department of Agriculture, and will be transferred to the Department of Commerce only if the transfer of the Authority takes effect, the reason for selecting the Department of Commerce hinges upon the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The President's statement says that aeronautics depends on the air-navigation charts of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. It does use such charts. However, the air-navigation charting work of the Survey is a mere drop in the bucket compared to the other work of the Survey. That work represents annually only 6 percent of the total charting work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and only 4 percent of all the work of the Survey. The Survey's services are availed of throughout the Government. Its services to civil aeronautics are not peculiar, nor do they occupy any great amount of attention.

Nor does the work of the Survey occupy the time of the Authority or peculiarly engage the attention of civil aeronautics. It is of no more importance than any other equipment which is purchased.

Infinitely more important to civil aeronautics than is the Coast and Geodetic Survey is the work of the State Department and of the War Department.

The Authority and the air lines spend far more time dealing with the Post Office Department.

The W. P. A. and its airport program are of infinitely more direct and extensive concern to civil aeronautics and the Authority than is the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The licensing of radio by the Federal Communications Commission, the handling of issues of stock through the Securities and Exchange Commission, the work of the National Mediation Board and the Labor Department—each of these quite overshadows, in importance to civil aeronautics, the preparation and sale of a few maps by the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The map-making of the Survey cannot lead the American people to forget the woeful failure of the Department of Commerce in attempting to regulate civil aeronautics prior to 1938. The record of the Department of Commerce cannot be covered over by a few maps.

The study of independent regulatory agencies made for the President's Brownlow committee passed judgment on the Department of Commerce as a proper house for agencies such as the Civil Aeronautics Authority. This is what that study said in 1937:

> The Department of Commerce exists mainly to render service to American business. It may be doubted whether a regulatory or disciplinary function will be aggressively and impartially handled by such a service department. (President's Committee on Administrative Management, Report With Special Studies (Government Printing Office, 1937), p. 232.)

According to recent press reports, even Mr. Brownlow disapproves of the President's selection of the Department of Commerce for civil aeronautics. Perhaps his observation of the Department in 1937 led him to doubt its capacity. In any case, those in Congress who so closely observed the work of the Bureau of Air Commerce were left with no doubts.

II

The second point made concerning the proposed reorganization is that after the shift into the Department the Authority will remain an independent board performing the basic regulatory functions. The President's statement to the press is that it will continue to appoint and control its own personnel and submit its own budget.

The terms of Reorganization Plan No. IV must, of course, control. They are the terms which, if adopted, will be determinative under the present and all future administrations.

Those terms are:

> * * * The budgeting, accounting, personnel, procurement, and related routine management functions of the Civil Aeronautics Board shall be performed under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of Commerce through such facilities as he shall designate or establish.

There is much in the wording of the two plans which is ambiguous and vague. Indeed, one of the chief objections to them is the extremely general and ambiguous language with which the machinery set up by Congress in the act is to be reorganized.

But when the plan states that the budgetary and personnel functions of the Board must be performed under the Secretary's direction through facilities designated by him, I would think that the meaning is clear; I would think that the meaning, moreover, is what the words imply, that the budgetary and personnel functions are to be performed under the direction of the Secretary through facilities of his choosing.

It may be that a budget can be submitted by the Board. But to whom may it be submitted? To the Secretary, or to facilities designated by him, and under his direction?

Of course the Board can make suggestions to the Secretary. So can the humblest clerk in his Department. The power to make suggestions to the Secretary is not independence of the Secretary. Particularly is it not independence when the Board is denied, by the express terms of the plan, the right to report to the President or the Congress except when permitted to do so by the Secretary.

Nor does the plan say that the Board can appoint and control its own personnel. The personnel functions are under exactly the same limitations as the budgetary functions. The same words, in each case, transfer control to the Secretary. Indeed, under the wording of the plan, the Secretary has no choice but to control the matter of personnel, for the plan says that such matters "shall be" directed by the Secretary.

There is another phase of this question. The only respect in which the plan provides for the independence of the Board is in respect to the functions of rule making, adjudication, and investigation. All the functions of the present Authority are, under section 7 (a) of plan IV, transferred to the Department of Commerce. And in section 7 (c) it is stated that the functions of rule making, adjudication, and investigation are to be exercised by the Board independently of the Secretary. But that is all. No other functions are embraced within this asserted independence.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he passes from the point to which he has just referred?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not a fact that under the plan as set up, while the Board may have authority to make safety regulations, the enforcement of such regulations will be in the Administrator, who is a subordinate official in the Commerce Department; so that, so far as the administration of the safety rules, which is the essentially important feature, is concerned, we get right back to where we were before this independent authority was created, by having the enforcement of air-safety regulations in the hands of a subordinate official in the Commerce Department?

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator's observation is entirely correct, and I am grateful for his contribution.

Mr. President, under the Civil Aeronautics Act the present Authority has many functions. Among them there are, at the very beginning of the act, two which are of primary importance.

One is in section 202 (a). That is the power to appoint personnel.

The other is in section 204 (a). That is the power to make expenditures.

Neither of these two functions is rule making, adjudication, or investigation. Therefore, neither comes within the provision for asserted independence in section 7 (c) of plan IV. But both are transferred to the Department of Commerce under section 7 (a) of the plan IV.

Therefore, these functions become ordinary departmental functions, and there is nothing in the plan to prevent the present Secretary or some future Secretary from bestowing those functions upon any agency he wishes, so long as it is within the Department. Certainly the Secretary will have full control over both matters.

What will result from this control over budget, expenditure, and personnel? Anything might result—anything but independence.

One thing which might result if the Secretary and, over him, the President are impressed by the Brownlow report is disclosed in a passage from the study of independent agencies made for the Brownlow committee.

That study stated, in connection with its discussion of the proposed creation of a judicial section and administrative section, the former to be "independent" and the latter subservient to the Executive, as follows:

> There is no reason why it (i. e., the judicial section) should have examiners or attorneys of its own. (President's Committee on Administrative Management, Report with Special Studies (Government Printing Office, 1937), p. 233.)

And the Brownlow report itself stated:

> The judicial section would sit as an impartial, independent body to make decisions affecting the public interest and private rights upon the basis of the records and findings presented to it by the administrative section. (President's Committee on Administrative Management, Report with Special Studies (Government Printing Office, 1937), p. 41.)

Under the proposed reorganization the new Board can be treated as Mr. Brownlow would have his so-called judicial sections treated. It can be denied the benefit of attorneys and examiners of its own; it can be forced to render its decisions upon records and findings presented to it by others.

With control over budget, expenditure, and personnel, this is what a Secretary of Commerce can bring about if he is favorably impressed with the Brownlow philosophy of administrative organization.

There have been efforts before this to place an independent agency in an executive department.

The Congress itself, when it created the Interstate Commerce Commission, provided that its reports should be made through the Secretary of the Interior; that the Secretary of the Interior should supply it with offices and facilities, and that the appointment and compensation of its employees should be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior (secs. 18 and 21, 24 U. S. Stat., pp. 386, 387).

This requirement remained in force for only 2 years, during which time two Secretaries of the Interior asked that the full independence of the Commission be provided for and pointed out the danger of thus blanketing such an agency into a department.

Secretary of the Interior Vilas, in his annual report for 1888, put the matter very clearly. He said:

> I desire to renew the recommendation of my predecessor in office, in the last annual report, that this Commission be made independent of the Department of the Interior, required to report directly to the President or to Congress, and authorized to appoint its own officers and employees and to deal directly with the Treasury in the expenditure of, and accounting for, the appropriations made for its support.
> The character of this Commission, as indicated by the nature of the duties assigned to it by law and the manner of its appointment, which it may be safely expected will always secure maintenance of its constitution upon the present high plane, renders this a measure of personal justice. Besides that, the duty of determining upon the appointment of its officers and employees on appeal, as it were, from the Commission itself, is invidious and irksome; nor is the Secretary of the Interior able to decide the questions involved, except by requiring an exhibition of the circumstances and conditions which affected the judgment of the Commission in making appointments or expenditures. He cannot well have any satisfactory or trustworthy means of independent inquiry. His duty must, therefore, either be perfunctorily performed, in which case it is still more disparaging of the character of the Commission, or it must be performed in the exercise of a superintending authority without means of judging as satisfactory as those possessed by the Commission whose action he reviews.

In short, from actual experience the Secretary of the Interior found that the powers granted him disparaged the character of the Commission and were irksome and invidious. He found that he could not satisfactorily or in a trustworthy manner exercise the powers conferred, because he could not pass judgment as well as the Commission could. Thus, the dilemma he faced was acting either unsatisfactorily or perfunctorily. In either case he found that his powers were disparaging of the Commission and inconsistent with its dignity.

In other words, to grant such powers was found by actual experience to invite incompetent and uninformed action by the Secretary and to be a blow at the character and position of the regulatory agency.

One other point in this connection: The President's statement says that the basic regulatory functions are to remain in an independent board. But observe that under plan III the Administrator receives the functions of safety regulation under title VI of the act, except for rule making and revoking of certificates. In other words, the entire matter of certificating and licensing personnel, aircraft and aircraft equipment, and air-carrier operations, and presumably the entire matter of inspecting aircraft and equipment, are transferred from the Authority to the Administrator; and under plan IV the Administrator becomes entirely subservient to the Secretary of Commerce, without even the nominal independence professed in the case of the Board. Yet in safety regulation the actual certificating and licensing, and the terms and conditions which go into such certificates and licenses, are vital. All of that goes to the Administrator, who becomes a mere servant of the Department of Commerce.

III

The third point made in the President's statement is that in the transfer of functions to the Administrator the reorganization will remedy the failure of the act to carry out the intent of Congress to distinguish clearly between the powers of the Administrator and the Authority.

It is necessary only to read the act to see that the intent of Congress was carried out and that the functions are clearly defined and distinguished.

All the powers of the Administrator are set forth in title III of the act. Those functions are the construction and operation of air-navigation facilities and engaging in promotional work.

The Authority's powers are regulatory powers and the powers to register and record title to aircraft. The economic regulation is set forth in title IV, registration and recordation in title V, and safety regulation in title VI. The division of powers is as clear as crystal and was one of the most extensively and carefully considered features of the Act.

What does the Reorganization Plan III do?

It garbles these powers badly.

Registration of aircraft goes to the Administrator; but registration of engines, propellers, and appliances remains in the Authority and recordation of title remains in the Authority, or the new board.

The advisers to the President, doubtless only partially familiar with the act, will surely be hard put to it to justify this extraordinary division of functions.

Then, as to safety regulation, rule making, and revocation and suspension of certificates after a hearing go to the Authority, or the new board, but all other safety regulation goes to the Administrator.

Thus, the Board will be unable to suspend a certificate without a hearing, and the Administrator will be unable to suspend a certificate with a hearing.

The Administrator will grant safety certificates, and presumably provide the terms and conditions therein; but the Board will make the rules. If the Administrator does not like one of the Board's rules he may promulgate terms and conditions that are inconsistent therewith; and if the Board does not like one of the Administrator's terms and conditions it may promulgate a rule inconsistent therewith.

The Board will pass on an air carrier's fitness and ability to perform service in connection with an application for a certificate of convenience and necessity. The Administrator will also pass on the carrier's ability to perform the service in connection with an application for an operating certificate.

The Board will specify points for operation in a certificate of convenience and necessity. The Administrator will do the same thing in an operating certificate.

The danger—the inevitability—of conflict and confusion is patent. In the present act, Congress deliberately placed all these matters in the Authority, so that one agency could coherently and expeditiously handle a subject matter which is an indivisible whole. But the reorganization plan splits the subject matter into parts, divides indivisible functions, and promotes confusion and conflict.

Who will suffer? The industry will suffer. Prior to the present act it was plagued nearly to distraction by divided jurisdiction. Congress intended to end that evil, and did so. The results have been notable. Now the reorganization will restore the old division of jurisdiction, and we shall once more be treated with the spectacle of "too many cooks spoiling the broth."

IV

The fourth point made by the President is a defense of the abolition of the Air Safety Board.

Plan IV abolishes the Board, which is now an independent agency for the investigation of accidents, and transfers its functions to the new Civil Aeronautics Board, the regulatory agency.

The President's statement says that this move will continue the present independence of accident investigation and also make possible prompt translation of findings into corrective action.

Under the present act, the Air Safety Board makes its findings and recommendations to the Authority. The Authority may accept or reject them. If it accepts them, it can promptly translate them into corrective action. To suggest that the new system would enable prompter translation is a desperate argument indeed. Under the reorganization there would still have to be investigation, findings, study, and recommendations. That would have to be done by a subordinate agency of the new Civil Aeronautics Board. Only when that had been done could there be translation into corrective action.

Under the present act, the Air Safety Board is devoted exclusively to this work of investigation. It can therefore handle such matters speedily, and it does so, and the Authority can act at once upon its recommendations. The proposed reorganization will not save a minute.

The most startling statement in the President's announcement is that "the present independence of accident investigation" will be continued. The President's advisers have, indeed, misread the present act. Under the present act there is independence of accident investigation, because a small Air Safety Board is set up for the sole purpose of investigating and studying aircraft accidents. It does not make the safety rules. It simply investigates and studies accidents, and it does so independently of the Authority which makes the safety rules.

But under the reorganization the rule-making board will also do the investigating. This is not independence. The proposal is to restore the very condition which prevailed under the old Bureau of Air Commerce, and which was so universally condemned. Under that condition the old Bureau both investigated and adopted the rules. That meant that when an accident occurred it often investigated itself. That was the evil. Mr. Vidal, Director of the old Bureau, admitted before the Senate Committee on Commerce that it was an evil. An investigation was a whitewash of the old Bureau. "Pilot's error," the investigators concluded. Naturally the Bureau did not criticize itself. The pilot was dead, and it blamed him.

The reorganization would restore that very condition. It would bring back the whitewash. This would not be because the members of the present Authority are cowardly, but it would be human nature for their own subordinates to carry to every accident a large pail of whitewash.

The country will be denied the constructive, life-preserving, accident-preventing effects of fearless, impartial, ruthless investigation and findings of fact.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I have been very much interested in what the Senator has said, and I know that he is a student of this problem. I should like to ask him whether he has heard of any organized effort on the part of passengers on the air lines to favor such a transfer as is proposed.

Mr. McCARRAN. If I catch the Senator's question aright, he asks whether I have heard of any concerted action on the part of air-line passengers favoring the President's Executive order.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. I have found nothing of that kind.

Mr. LODGE. Has the Senator heard that those who own and manage and operate the air lines are in favor of such a transfer?

Mr. McCARRAN. On the contrary, a resolution opposing the transfer was unanimously adopted by the Air Transportation Association of America, consisting I am advised, of all the air lines, which resolution was read into the RECORD by the Senator from Idaho, I believe, at my behest, a few days ago.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not also true that the pilots and other men who actually operate the airplanes in the air are all opposed to the transfer?

Mr. McCARRAN. They are unanimously opposed to the transfer.

Mr. LODGE. Then, it is accurate to say that outside of official circles there is virtually no one in the United States who supports the proposal?

Mr. McCARRAN. My observation, as I read and listen, confirms the implication of the question asked by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, the final point in the President's statement is that savings will be accomplished.

He states that highly paid positions on the Air Safety Board will be eliminated.

This amounts to a total of $22,500 a year.

An investment of a paltry sum, indeed, when millions of lives are at stake. A paltry sum, indeed, when we remember that the air lines of America, in the first year of the operation of the Civil Aeronautics Act, flew 86,000,000 plane-miles and 821,000,000 passenger-miles without a single fatality, and that was done on an investment of $22,500.

Mr. LUNDEEN. That is a better record than the railroads made.

Mr. McCARRAN. I may say to the Senator that in all the history of transportation, even from the oxcart days down to the present, no such record can be found.

If accident investigation is to continue, no other personnel can be eliminated. And if the lost services of the members of the present Safety Board are to be made up in any way, the saving will be less than $22,500 by whatever amount is required to secure men to take their places.

Twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars is the price paid for vigorous, forthright investigation and search for truth, let the chips fall where they may.

A small price, this, for safety's sake. Twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars is worth more to the passengers and pilots than a bucket of whitewash.

There came to my office this morning, on my arrival in the city of Washington, a group of about 30 of the finest young men God ever produced, young Americans capable of transporting passengers and property from coast to coast in safety. They, the air-line pilots of this country, were there asking how they might assist, seeking to know how they might assist so that their lives and the lives of the passengers whom they would transport across the continent may have continued assurance of safety such as has been afforded to them under the Civil Aeronautics Authority for the past year.

The President's statement also suggests vaguely that other economies will be possible. How? Unless the functions of the present Authority are to be taken over by the personnel of the Department, there can be no savings. The Authority and its staff are already working overtime.

Of all eventualities which it may earnestly be hoped will not occur, high among them is that the Department personnel—budgetary, legal, or otherwise—unschooled in aeronautics as they are, should have anything to do with this great, new, growing industry.

The President's statement likewise asserts that he was advised by the Budget Bureau that a change in the C. A. A. setup "was imperative if we were to continue to move forward in civil aviation."

The Budget Bureau must have myopia. We have just finished the greatest year in the history of civil aviation. We are moving ahead at an accelerating rate under what the National Safety Council has rightly termed the "inspiring leadership" of the C. A. A., establishing a record which the senior Senator from Missouri a few weeks ago accurately described as five times better than anything we have ever done before.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I think the public will be interested in the names of the Chairmen and members of the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Air Safety Board. The Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Authority is Robert H. Hinckley, and the members are Harllee Branch, G. Grant Mason, Jr., Oswald Ryan, and Edward P. Warner. The members of the Air Safety Board are Thomas Hardin, Chairman, C. B. Allen, and Sumpter Smith.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, under the impetus given to aeronautics by the Civil Aeronautics Act, and under the wise administration of the Authority and the watchful eye of the Air Safety Board, we have scaled new heights. And our rate of advance is even greater today than it was 6 months ago.

A vast civilian-pilot-training program has been successfully inaugurated, and is being ably executed, which represents the most stupendous effort ever made in the field of private flying. Scheduled air transportation has been achieving new records almost weekly. Where in this shining success are we failing to move ahead?

Retrogression was halted abruptly when the C. A. A. took the helm. The Department of Commerce, with its layers of officialdom passing the buck backward and forward, was searchingly scrutinized and pronounced wanting by the Senate Committee on Commerce. It took the death of one of our colleagues in an air-line crash to bring to light the evils of the old order. Those evils have been corrected by the creation of an independent agency. If the Bureau of the Budget suffers from myopia, the public and the pilots and the industry, and the boys and girls in the civilian-pilot-training program and their parents, can see clearly enough.

What they see is advancement and achievement such as was never before known.

The record speaks with the eloquence of accomplishment.

Mr. President, in conclusion, let me say that 6 years of ardent study of this subject by those who gave their best efforts to writing the law which was enacted by the Congress, 6 years of everlasting patience in the study of aviation, caused me in the past to enlist, and again causes me to reenlist, to the end that this country, having accomplished more in aviation than any other country in the world, shall not now, at the very zenith, take a backward step.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I should like to have printed at the end of the Senator's speech, in its proper place, remarks by Secretary of the Navy Edison in regard to the protection of our fleet and its relation to aircraft. In that connection I wish to call attention to the statements made several years ago by our beloved Air General William Mitchell, which are shown by these remarks of the Secretary of the Navy to have been accurate.

SUPREMACY IN THE AIR

You cannot have supremacy on the seas without supremacy in the air. I take that to be axiomatic, and I am willing to let that statement stand.

John Ericsson once revolutionized all the navies of the world by building the ironclad Monitor with its revolving turret. Every wooden battleship went to the scrap heap.

DEATH TRAPS OF THE DEEP

Today the dinosaurs of the deep, our battleships, must have air protection or sink. We need new battleship-building technique—new designs, better protection for men and munitions aboard—and there is not a minute to lose if we are to be up to date. Yet we insist on wasting our money on old designs, useless, outworn, and outdated vulnerable ships—death traps for our brave and skilled sailors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECRETARY EDISON'S STATEMENT

[From the Washington Evening Star of May 1, 1940]

WARSHIP "SUNK" UNDER HIM, EDISON ASKS BETTER AIR DEFENSE—VESSELS VULNERABLE TO PLANES' ATTACK, SAYS SECRETARY, PLANNING TO CALL CONFERENCE

(By Fred H. Morhart, Jr.)

Secretary of the Navy Edison today called for a general revision of the topsides of fighting ships after having watched maneuvers in the Pacific Ocean.

He declared the warships are vulnerable to air attack to the extent that damage, though not sinking the ships, would disrupt communications, fire control, and general operation.

Mr. Edison also revealed that at least one ship theoretically was sunk under him during the Navy's sham battle. He said the destroyer Warrington was sunk while he was aboard observing operations involved in fleet problem 21.

He also said the flagship Pennsylvania received considerable mimic damage from shellfire. He reported the damage was inflicted during a night attack which featured heavy shellfire.

The Navy Secretary said, in discussing his maneuver operations, that he intends to hold conferences with the Navy's high command on remodeling this country's fighting ships with a view to strengthening air defenses.

On modern ships such as destroyers, he said, it is the intention of the Navy to provide increased protection for gun crews and personnel working above decks.

Mr. Edison said there was no intention of asking Congress to provide additional funds this year for changes in the superstructure. At the same time, however, he expressed disappointment that Congress had not provided for a 25-percent increase this year in the Navy's appropriation. The present bill makes provision only for an 11-percent increase in appropriations.

He reported that the shipbuilding program is aproaching a peak and that any greater activity in the program would hardpress Government and private shipyards.

Mr. Edison, after viewing the sham sea battle, said he thought for the time being that aircraft held a decided advantage. In discussing this subject he referred to the difficulties experienced on the British cruiser Exeter which fought the Graf Spee. He pointed out that the ship was operated manually almost entirely after being severely damaged by the 11-inch guns of the German ship. He said an air attack on ships could likewise severely damage the "fighting top and control of the ship."

"Air power raises the risk on ships and certain operations," he said. However, he claimed to doubt that air attacks would actually sink a first-line ship.

Flank armament cited

More attention, he said, is now being given to flank armament. He said because of the length of time needed for construction, increase in side armaments probably would take a number of years.

In discussing defenses of the Panama Canal Zone, Mr. Edison expressed the opinion the United States needs additional outlying bases in the Caribbean Sea area. He pointed out defenses on the Pacific side were considerably stronger than those on the Atlantic side. He said he hoped provision soon would be made for air and fleet bases on the Canal's Atlantic outposts.

In discussing the general picture of the Navy, Mr. Edison said that, although the fighting ships were of a goodly number, there was a need for new auxiliary ships. He specifically mentioned hospital, colliers, general supply boats, and transports as being on the deficient list.

Mr. Edison, in expressing an opinion on the Navy's fuel-oil supply in the Territory of Hawaii, said he would like to see all the tanks placed underground in bombproof shelters. He said that viewed from the air, the large tanks were outstanding targets. He added that part of the maneuvers included a test of naval supplies in the outlying Pacific outposts.

He also added that there was a strong need at present for additional cold-storage plants.

STATEMENTS BY AIR GENERAL WILLIAM MITCHELL

[Source: Winged Defense, 1925]

DINOSAURS OF THE DEEP

The battleship is so expensive and difficult to maintain and so vulnerable to aircraft and submarines that it will be eliminated eventually. Sea power as expressed in battleships is almost a thing of the past. Battleship fleets can no longer control the sea lanes of communication. This attribute has passed to aircraft and undersea boats. The tremendous power of submarines is just beginning to be understood by the people, as the facts and figures relative to their use were concealed largely for political purposes during and even since the war. During the war the Germans maintained at sea only about 30 submarines. These 30 submarines sank 11,000,000 tons of Allied shipping. They sank 7,600,000 tons of British shipping, and in 9 months of the war, during 1918, they sank 1,800,000 tons of British shipping. Forty percent of all British shipping was destroyed by these few submarines, which reduced the British Isles to the verge of starvation. The Germans never employed over 10,000 men in the handling of their submarine forces, whereas the Allies employed over a million men in countersubmarine operations and spent hundreds of millions of dollars for equipment. All of these measures were comparatively ineffective.

AVIATION AND SUBMARINES

* * * When war between two powers separated by oceans occurs in the future, all sea lanes leading to the hostile power will be planted with mines by submarines. The surface of all oceans will be districted and organized in geographic squares. To each square submarines will be assigned and a constant patrol will be kept, no matter whether there be warships or commercial ships of the opposing side crossing the seas. The submarines' power is sufficient to destroy any surface vessels, including battleships or other war craft. Nations, therefore, will put their money and effort into submarines instead of battleship fleets because the submarine operations are more economical in financial expenditure, in numbers of men employed, and in effectiveness. They, however, are largely a defensive element. They cannot transport troops across the seas as can surface vessels. At present, surface craft only may be used for this purpose and also to act as airplane carriers for transporting planes to hostile shores and launching them. As airplane-carrying vessels are of no use against hostile air forces with bases on shore, and as they can only be of use against other vessels of hostile fleets that are on the surface of the water, and as these fleets will be supplanted by submarines, there is little use for the retention of airplane carriers in the general scheme of armaments.

ANCIENT METHODS AND PROPAGANDA

* * * Surface navies, particularly battleships and other surface craft, are rapidly losing their importance as they can only be used for offensive operations across the sea and have little or no defensive value. They are the most expensive equipment in the military scheme. What is keeping them up as much as anything else and largely preventing open and free discussion of their uses are the propaganda agencies maintained by navies for perpetuating the existing systems. Not only do they resist any change which will take away from the battleship its primary importance in sea dominion, but they tend to minimize and depreciate the ability of air power and submarines. Propaganda has a great effect on the public mind. As the people are the ultimate judge of what national defense should be, as expressed by their legislatures, it is necessary that the exact facts be submitted to them without restraint or evasion.

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS

* * * The rapidly increasing efficiency of the airplane and the submarine gives us the opportunity to move toward a new limitation of armaments. Both of these implements of national defense are essentially defensive in their nature as distinguished from offensive military arrangements designed for aggression across and beyond the seas.

They will cause new economies in national expenditures. For example, more than 1,000 airplanes can be built and maintained for the outlay required for a single battleship. Airplanes have a great application in time of peace in useful civil and commercial pursuits. The same airplanes can do this work that are suitable for duty in war and for national defense. In fact all aircraft developments, the factories that make them, the airways that are established for civil aviation and the civilian pilots and crews, are distinct military assets, and can bring in a return in time of peace, thereby reducing the national expenditure necessary in their maintenance if they were kept solely and exclusively for war.

TIME VINDICATES GEN. BILLY MITCHELL, AMERICAN AIR HERO

[From the New York Times of February 20, 1936]

GENERAL MITCHELL DIES; AIR LEADER IN WAR—FLYING HERO QUIT ARMY IN 1926 AFTER COURT MARTIAL FOR HIS CRITICISM OF SUPERIORS—BEGAN AS PRIVATE IN 1898—ROSE TO ASSISTANT CORPS CHIEF—A PIONEER IN SERVICE, HE PREDICTED OCEAN FEATS

Brig. Gen. William Lendrum (Billy) Mitchell, commander of the United States air forces in France during the World War and afterward director of military aviation, died at 4:45 o'clock yesterday afternoon in Doctors Hospital, where he had been confined with a heart ailment since January 28. He was 56 years old.

At his bedside when he died was Mrs. Mitchell, the former Elizabeth Trumbull Miller, whom he married in 1923. The cause of death was recorded as coronary occlusion.

Funeral services will be held at 10 a. m. Saturday in St. Paul's Cathedral, Milwaukee.

Advancement through all grades from that of private, which he became by regular enlistment at the outbreak of the Spanish-American War, up to that of brigadier general, which he achieved as commander of the air forces in France during the World War, had come to General Mitchell when the headline name "Gen. Billy Mitchell" flamed into the news consciousness of the American people in the fall of 1925.

It achieved that status because a demoted corps area air officer in Texas had asserted that the high command of both the Army and Navy were guilty of "incompetency, criminal negligence, and almost treasonable administration of the national defense."

A bitter critic of aviation

But backward from that date, back to the close of the World War, and forward from that date through his trial by court martial for violation of the ninety-sixth article of war, through his avoidance of a 5-year suspension from the Army lists by his voluntary resignation, and on into his retirement as a wealthy stock raiser and gentleman farmer, "Billy" Mitchell was known as the stormy petrel of American aviation. At times it seemed as if nothing that was done in the development of American aviation, either military or civilian, was right or adequate in his opinion.

General Mitchell, as he was always known as a result of his war rating, was a prophetic and vitriolic critic.

When in the summer of 1921 he and fellow officers successfully demonstrated the possibility of destroying a battleship with aerial bombs by sinking from the air the former German dreadnaught Ostfriedland and the former German cruiser Frankfort, all battleships became in General Mitchell's words subservient to the airplane and all navies became obsolete.

Many of his other aviation prophecies came true in time. In 1922 he predicted a day when airplanes would fly at the unheard-of speed of 250 miles an hour. Within 10 years of that warning prediction airplanes had flown nearly 500 miles an hour. In 1923, to focus attention upon the dangers of an aerial attack on America from across the Pacific, General Mitchell painted a seemingly fanciful picture of a day when airplanes would fly regularly from China to San Francisco. That was 4 years before anyone had demonstrated that the Atlantic, let alone the Pacific, could be crossed by air.

Long before he uttered the charges which brought him his court martial Mitchell was baiting his superiors and twitting those in authority for their incompetence in handling the instruments, usually the airplane, which had been placed in their care for use and development. As early as 1910 he was saying that America would be helpless in an air war and that an air fleet could wipe out all of New York City; and in 1921 he was saying that the airplane made the battleship practically useless.

He repeated the latter charge so often that finally the naval authorities looked over their war prizes and selected the Ostfriedland and the Frankfort upon which they offered to permit the Army fliers to test their chief's "extravagant claims." On July 18, 1921, a squadron of Army bombers from Langley Field sank the Frankfort 60 miles east of the Virginia capes. Two days later they dealt the same fate to the Ostfriedland.

The man who fought for his belief and faith in the airplane for more than a decade was born in Nice, France, December 29, 1879, while his parents, the former United States Senator John Lendrum and Harriet Danforth (Becker) Mitchell, were sojourning abroad. Mitchell's father had served as a Union soldier in the Civil War and from him he inherited a tradition and instinct for the military. Much of his home education was in the military tradition, and his extracurricular interest was so largely wrapped up with military history that the boy was exceptionally well-grounded in this field.

Studied at Washington

Returning to the United States with his parents, the boy entered Racine College in Wisconsin and later was graduated from George Washington University. He was with his family in Washington when the United States declared war on Spain. Although he had just reached 18, he returned to Racine immediately and enlisted as a private in Company M of the First Wisconsin Infantry. This was on May 14, 1898. He had achieved the rank of lieutenant when his company reached Cuba, and he served there on the staff of Gen. Fitzhugh Lee. He was in the Philippines during the insurrection, one of the youngest officers on the staff of General MacArthur, whose son, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, was lated Chief of Staff of the Army and a member of the military court that convicted Mitchell in 1925.

Mitchell early in his military career began specializing in communications, which was the primary concern of the Signal Corps. It was through the accident of the fact that when the Wright brothers and Glenn H. Curtiss developed the first military planes in this country and the Army, being in a quandary as to what to do with this new instrument, consigned it to the Signal Corps, that Mitchell first became interested in aviation.

Returning from the Philippines to Washington, young Mitchell was commissioned to lay telegraph lines from Eagle City down the Yukon and across the Tanama country to Prince William Sound, a distance of 3,000 miles. Although the feat had been attempted twice before and had failed, Mitchell, despite many hardships and handicaps, finally completed the task.

Saw plane demonstration

At 24, with the rank of captain in the Signal Corps, Mitchell was one of that select historic company that witnessed the first demonstration of a military plane by the Wright brothers at Fort Myer in September 1908. He met the Wright brothers for the first time on that occasion, and it was from Orville Wright, 6 years later, after Congress had appropriated $13,000,000 for the organization of the First Aero Squadron, that Mitchell learned to fly. He was soloed by Wright after 2 hours of instruction.

In March 1917, upon completion of a tour of duty as a member of the General Staff, Mitchell, then a major, was in Spain on leave. On April 6, when the United States entered the war, he was in Toledo. He proceeded at once to Paris, and through special arrangements he was attached to the staff of General Pétain and was one of the first American Army officers to participate in an attack with the French. With the fuller organization of the American Expeditionary Force in France, Mitchell was assigned to assist Gen. Mason M. Patrick in the building up of the Air Service force on the front. He later succeeded to the command of this service, with the rank of brigadier general. He served as Chief of Air Service, Zone of Advance; Chief of Air Service, First Corps; Chief of Air Service, First Army; and Chief of Air Service, Group of Armies.

Decorated for bravery

His official war record states that he received the Distinguished Service Cross for "repeated acts of extraordinary heroism in action at Noyon, France, in March 1918"; and in July of the same year he "displayed bravery beyond that required by his position as Chief of Air Service," by piloting his plane over the battle lines and gaining information as to the disposition of air and ground forces which led to a change in the tactical methods of the air wing. For his World War service he received, in addition to the Distinguished Service Cross, the Distinguished Service Medal, Croix de Guerre with five palms, Commander of the Legion of Honor (French), Companion of the Order of St. Michael and St. George (British), Commendatore S. S. Maurizio é Lazzaro, Medal for Merit in War and Grand Officer of Italy.

Returning to the United States after the armistice, General Mitchell was immediately made Assistant Chief of the Army Air Service and put in direct charge of the training of the aviation force of the Army. A brilliant war career behind him and filled with enthusiasm for the new instrument which had proved itself in that war, he immediately became an outspoken and tireless critic of what America was doing with her opportunity of becoming a leading air power of the world.

At the end of his regular 4-year tour of duty as Assistant Chief of the Air Corps, as it was now called, he was not reappointed to that post. He was reduced to his Regular Army grade of colonel and sent to Texas as air officer of the Eighth Corps Area. He had been at this new station only a short time when he made his famous statement about the high command "inefficiency, incompetency, criminal negligence, and almost treasonable administration."

Mitchell was tried for violation of the ninety-sixth article of war, was found guilty on all counts, and the verdict of the court martial was suspension for 5 years without pay or allowances. President Coolidge later reviewed the sentence and, while he upheld the suspension, he restored the allowances and one-half of his monthly base pay. Less than 2 weeks after this Presidential review and commutation of his sentence, General Mitchell, on February 1, 1926, resigned from the Army.

As a private citizen, however, he remained a bitter critic of the conduct of American aviation.

On October 11, 1923, General Mitchell was married to Miss Elizabeth Trumbull Miller at Detroit, Mich. There are two children, Lucy Trumbull and William Mitchell, Jr. General Mitchell was a member of the Metropolitan, the Chevy Chase, and the Army and Navy Clubs of Washington. Among his writings which have appeared in book form are Our Air Force, Winged Defense, and Skyways.

Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide—Lowell.

Mr. LUNDEEN. General Mitchell lives on in glory, his critics and defamers are forgotten. The great principles he laid down live after him and today we do him honor—honor which he so richly deserves.

I rise today to call the Senate's attention to these principles. Let those who differ answer now. Let them answer during the coming Navy debate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. CONNALLY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Arthur D. Fairbanks, of Colorado, to be United States marshal for the district of Colorado.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ELLENDER in the chair). If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Thomas M. Woodward to be a member of the United States Maritime Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

COAST GUARD

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Coast Guard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Coast Guard are confirmed en bloc.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, May 2, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 1, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RAYBURN.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, restful are the moments of prayer when we can look up and feel the presence of the Christ who came to seek and to save that which was lost. We pray that He may encircle us, revealing the higher truths, wider charities, and rarer purities than we have known. We thank Thee for this day, another dispensation of Thy providence. Be Thou unto us the wisdom that makes error difficult, the light that makes the darkness fade and the bread of heaven that quickens the best impulses of our souls. Consider the Congress, dear Lord; bless the bonds of fraternity, the ties of friendship, and the affections of all homes. Grant that no failures, no regrets, and no sin may follow in the wake of this day. Let us brave every ignoble thing and temper, being sure of the fullness of victory, whatever our weakness, and always aiming at the sincerest, deepest, and purest personal life. In our Saviour's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. St. Claire, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 7737) entitled "An act to amend the Judicial Code by adding a new section thereto, designated as section 266a, to provide for intervention by States in certain cases involving the validity of the exercise of any power by the United States, or any agency thereof, or any officer or employee thereof, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. MILLER, and Mr. DANAHER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2925. An act to amend the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 5 (B) OF THE ACT OF OCTOBER 6, 1917

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 252) to amend section 5 (b) of the act of October 6, 1917, as amended, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration and passage.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 252

Resolved, etc., That the first sentence of subdivision (b) of section 5 of the act of October 6, 1917 (40 Stat. 411), as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"During time of war or during any other period of national emergency declared by the President, the President may, through any agency that he may designate, or otherwise, investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange, transfers of credit between or payments by or to banking institutions as defined by the President, and export, hoarding, melting, or earmarking of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, and any transfer, withdrawal, or exportation of, or dealing in, any evidences of indebtedness or evidences of ownership of property in which any foreign state or a national or political subdivision thereof, as defined by the President, has any interest, by any person within the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof; and the President may require any person to furnish under oath, complete information relative to any transaction referred to in this subdivision or to any property in which any such foreign state, national, or political subdivision has any interest, including the production of any books of account, contracts, letters, or other papers, in connection therewith in the custody or control of such person, either before or after such transaction is completed."

SEC. 2. Executive Order No. 8389 of April 10, 1940, and the regulations and general rulings issued thereunder by the Secretary of the Treasury are hereby approved and confirmed.

SEC. 3. Nothing in this joint resolution shall be deemed to repeal or to modify in any manner any of the provisions of the act of April 13, 1934 (48 Stat. 574) (The Johnson Act), or of the Neutrality Act of 1939 (Public Resolution No. 54, Seventy-sixth Congress).

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House joint resolution was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a short editorial from the Atlanta Constitution relating to the tenant-land purchase program.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise again to announce my opposition to the continuation in any form or fashion of the unfair, un-American provisions of the Sugar Act of 1937.

The most recent penalty suffered by the sugarcane farmers of my district was invoked by the Department of Agriculture in an order issued on April 27, 1940, which appears in the Federal Register of yesterday.

This order is but one of many concrete examples of the unjust discrimination provided for in the Sugar Act of 1937 against American labor, American farmers, and the American housewife. The order referred to, coming at this time when the administration is endeavoring to increase employment, raise the standard of living of the laboring man and farmer, causes me to wonder if its tragic results are clearly understood.

This order reduces Florida's sugar quota by 42,000 tons which is a 42 percent reduction over the small quota of last year allotted to my State. I remind you, sugar is a non-surplus product and that although Florida has the lowest cost of production and pays the highest agricultural wage, we are allowed, under the iniquitous Sugar Act of 1937, to supply less than 1 percent of this Nation's sugar needs.

You are interested, I know, in how this recent order affects American labor. Two thousand and five hundred heads of families in Florida will be deprived of employment at the highest agricultural wage payed under the American flag, absolutely because this Congress voted for and passed the Sugar Act of 1937. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that those who voted for that act understood its drastic consequences.

The 2,500 families which I referred to are in south Florida. I do not know how many more good American families in other areas will be sacrificed on the altar of foreign goodwill under the idiotic pretense that we must buy our sugar at premium prices from foreign countries. Idiotic, because America can produce all of its own sugar needs at a low cost of production.

Mr. Speaker, the farmers of my district, and sugar farmers generally, want to know how much longer they will be forced to put their children to bed without supper in order to provide the children of the Wall Street bankers, owners of foreign sugar companies, with Packards and Rolls Royces.

Some of my esteemed colleagues, Mr. Speaker, have had the unmitigated gall to intimate that they desire to see this Congress reenact that Sugar Act which gives this monopoly to our friends of Wall Street. I trust that they now fully understand what they are proposing for American labor and the American farmer, and that their efforts will be met on this floor with the full force of those who represent an indignant and long suffering American public, who, in my humble opinion will heartily vote down any such legislation, no matter in what form or disguise it is presented. [Applause.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, under the President's proposed reorganization of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, it is provided that the Authority will be able to report to Congress and the President only through the Secretary of Commerce.

This will mean that free and independent advice to Congress from an expert agency on matters relating to civil aeronautics cannot be secured. Advice on such matters can come only through a political department and a political appointee in the Cabinet.

The value of independent reports directly to Congress from an independent expert agency is well illustrated by experience with the Interstate Commerce Commission. For 50 years that agency has exercised a constructive influence in furnishing Congress with independent advice on transportation matters. Its annual reports and its special reports have furnished a storehouse of sound information and disinterested criticism.

When the Civil Aeronautics Authority was created as an independent agency Congress provided that it should make regular reports and recommendations just as does the Interstate Commerce Commission.

But the proposed reorganization, by requiring that its reports can be made only through the Secretary of Commerce, would gag that agency and would deny to Congress the benefit of its independent advice. Civil aeronautics should be freely and independently regulated and Congress should receive free and independent reports from the agency it has created.

The proposed reorganization should be disapproved. [Applause.]

APPOINTMENT TO HOUSE COMMITTEES

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask for its immediate adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 477

Resolved, That J. HYDE SWEET, of Nebraska, be, and he is hereby, elected to the following committees of the House of Representatives: Committee on Indian Affairs, Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, and Committee on War Claims.

The resolution was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, during the nearly 6 years I have served as a Member of this House, I have heard much said about different forms of government, dictatorships, and so forth. At times there have been statements to the effect that certain legislation which we had under consideration pointed toward the setting up of a dictatorship in our country. There is no doubt in my mind but there are subversive influences at work in America, and that they are seeking to undermine our Government. They are making their appeal to all supposedly disgruntled groups. I am firmly of the opinion that such an appeal is being made to the Negroes, the largest minority group in this country.

I have implicit faith in the loyalty of the Negro, but at the present time there are evidences of small groups here and there giving an attentive ear to doctrines which are subversive in their nature. I regard such teachings as being not only detrimental to our Government but most destructive and detrimental to the best interests of my group. I do not wish to go on record as being in sympathy with the injustices from which my people suffer. I have denounced them on the floor of this House time and again. I have pleaded for absolute justice and I have asked the Nation to wipe out discriminations against the largest minority group, but I look with disapproval upon any activity which smacks of disloyalty to this Government.

I believe that communism as taught and practiced in Russia is seeking through its agents to disrupt the good feelings between the two races in this country. I deplore this and disapprove it as does the great majority of Negroes. I have no confidence in these so-called revolutionary organizations springing up here and there among certain of our citizens, white and colored. It is my opinion that there are designing white men and women in the United States today who are deliberately seeking to take advantage of whatever dissatisfaction exists among the Negroes and are seeking to use the Negro as a tool against this Government. This I condemn with all of my heart.

I wish to go on record as condemning the activities of the so-called National Negro Congress as expressed in a resolution which I understand was passed by the organization while in session here last week, which resolution purported to set forth a statement that should this country become involved in war with Soviet Russia, Negroes would refuse to fight on the side of our Government. This I brand as a deliberate mistatement of fact. Negroes have always been loyal to this Government. In this time of unrest there might be a traitor found here and there, but I wish to assure this Congress, and the Nation at large that the Negro is a lover of this country—it is his home; he knows no other, and while his country might withhold from him, and does withhold from him, many of the privileges of American citizens, the well-thinking Negro does not wish to and will not raise his hand against this Government, it matters not with whom we become engaged in war.

It is my hope that the American people will never again have the occasion to engage in bloody conflict with any nation, but I say to you that should that day come when we must engage in such a conflict, the Negro will be found loyal to this Government, fighting for it just as he did in the Revolutionary War, just as he did in the Civil War, and just as he did in the War of 1812, and just as he did in the Spanish-American War and in the World War. These persons who resolve otherwise do not represent the feelings, thoughts, and intentions of the millions of well-thinking Negroes to be found in all parts of the country.

I wish to go on record as thoroughly disapproving the appeal made to the Negro at this National Negro Congress by the labor leader, John L. Lewis. It is my opinion that John L. Lewis is the most dangerous, outstanding leader in America today, and it is his desire to change our form of government and to establish a dictatorship in America. I also believe that he wishes to be the American dictator. God forbid that any such day should come. My final word is this: The Negro stands loyally by the American flag and will give his blood, and his life to protect it against any foe, whether German, English, French, Russian, or what not. We are Americans, all of us. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein the testimony of Hon. Theodore Christiansen on H. R. 1 before the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to have inserted as a part of my remarks a letter written to me regarding civil-service examinations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this letter, which I am going to read if I have the time, bears out my contention that the United States Civil Service Commission is overworked and unable to rate properly the thousands of examinations being held for Federal positions. The decision in the case at hand is ridiculous and shows the need of adjustment in the examining procedure of the Commission. It is evident to everybody who reads this letter that the applicant for the position had not only the educational qualifications but experience qualifications far beyond the requirement. He is also a man of the highest character and integrity.

And, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say again that the bill (H. R. 960) should not pass. It has already passed the House, but I hope it will be defeated in the Senate, because that bill would blanket in, noncompetitively, in an unassembled examination, from 250,000 to 300,000 people and, Mr. Speaker, we must not take into the Federal service those who are not qualified. We should pass those who are qualified, such as this man who from training and fine experience obviously is qualified to pass a real examination. The following letter is self-explanatory:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 27, 1940.

Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN ROGERS: Last fall the Civil Service Commission gave a competitive examination for three grades of statistician, $3,600 to $5,600. This was under announcement No. 104, unassembled. The closing date was October 16. I applied for ratings under all three grades.

About 5 months later the Commission notified me, by an undated form letter, that I had been disapproved for all three grades, because my experience did not qualify me for even the lowest grade. Enclosed is a copy of my letter of April 1 to the Board of Reviews and Appeals, protesting against that decision. My letter has not been acknowledged.

As stated in my application for this examination, I hold a doctor of philosophy degree from Columbia University (1922), for work including a thorough academic training in statistical method. Rare among statisticians, I am also a trained and experienced accountant and auditor (even Federal accounts), and I am long experienced at directing research and editing the results. As a World War veteran, I am entitled to preference in these competitive examinations.

I have served in three departments of the Federal Government, for a total of 17 years, mostly in executive positions as statistician or economist, at salaries ranging from $5,000 to $6,200. For more than 5 years I compiled the Commerce Department's "Balance of International Payments of the United States," possibly the most complicated and exacting statistical publication of the Government.

My technical publications include three volumes and several dozen articles in the professional and financial magazines. High professional praise of those publications won me a legend in "Who's Who in America" (1940–41 edition), as an economist and statistician of national repute.

Personal justice to me in this examination would serve the interest of the whole merit system. Preposterous ratings like this expose that system to ridicule by all intelligent persons who learn of them, and they can only dismay the thousands who look to careers in the public service under that system. Millions of voters must hope for a sound civil service.

As a member of the House Committee on Civil Service, can you help me gain the rating I merit under this examination?

Respectfully yours.

This particular case is an excellent example of what may be expected to happen if H. R. 960 becomes a law. Hundreds of thousands of employees would be given noncompetitive, or unassembled examinations, with the result that their qualifications, both as to education and experience, would receive little more than cursory attention. It is one of the best arguments against the enactment of H. R. 960 that I have seen.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a telegram from the Air Line Pilots of Alaska.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, there were many criticisms of the old Bureau of Air Commerce. And they were well founded.

One of the principal criticisms which was substantiated abundantly was that the officials within the old Bureau and the Department of Commerce passed the buck.

It took weeks and months to get things done because so many initials were required on letters, there were so many approvals to be secured, and so many people were able to say that someone else was responsible.

One of the great virtues of the Civil Aeronautics Authority is that responsibility is definitely centralized.

The Authority is responsible for regulation. The Administrator is responsible for building the airways. Neither the Authority nor the Administrator can pass the buck. This is the kind of administration that is needed for this fast-growing industry.

Now it is proposed to reorganize the Authority and the Administrator and put them both back into the Department of Commerce.

The Authority will become a subordinate board. The Administrator will become a chief clerk. Over them there will be an Under Secretary and an Assistant Secretary and a Secretary of Commerce. And each of them will have advisers and attorneys.

Thus an entire additional tier of officialdom will be erected. And buck-passing will return. The old evils of the old Bureau of Air Commerce will be multiplied. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a brief editorial appearing in the Palladium-Item of Richmond, Ind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a brief extract from a speech delivered by Hon. Albert James, of Dover, Del., on April 24, in relation to the gold and silver policy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Also, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include a resolution adopted by the Sussex County National Farm Loan Association.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to insert therein a copy of the F. B. I. pledge for law-enforcement officers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a quotation from the Washington Post.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Friday next after the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and any special orders, I be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, in the preamble to the Constitution of the United States we find that one of the purposes of the Constitution is stated:

> To provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.

Knowing that plans similar to Reorganization Plan No. IV have heretofore been proven to be contrary to public interest and contrary to the national defense, I would be lax in my duty to our country, to ourselves, and to our posterity if I did not oppose it.

The assured defense and vital interest of all parts of the United States is vital to the fulfillment of the purposes stated in the Constitution which created our Government. Potential successful defense is essential to the fulfillment of the purposes of the Constitution.

In order that the attainment of these vital and important purposes may be assured, it is imperative that the United States shall have an air carrier industry capable of fulfilling our military needs.

Air transportation of personnel and matériel played an important part in the Ethiopian campaign. General Franco in Spain proved himself a master in the art of transporting troops by air and, just within the last 2 or 3 weeks, we have seen Germany make a major use of air transport across the Skagerrak and Kattegat.

Vital to our national defense is the ability of our common-carrier air-transport industry instantly and efficiently always to remain able to transport the personnel and matériel of our armed forces whenever and wherever our military situation may require. That must be one of the reasons why President Roosevelt, in his open letter of January 24, 1939, stated:

> Underlying the statute (Civil Aeronautics Act) is the principle that the country's welfare in time of peace and its safety in time of war rests upon * * * an economically and technically sound air-transportation system, both domestic and overseas.

Knowing all this to be true, we must be frank and forthright in our loyalty to the fundamental concepts of government upon which our country has built the greatest and, since the summer of 1938, the happiest air-carrier system the world has ever known—not to speak of the greatest and happiest civilization the world has ever known. That is why we are willing to fight to save it for our children who come after us.

If, after full debate, the Congress deliberately and freely elects to return civil aeronautics to the politically infested Department of Commerce and to the eternally confused regime daily operating therein, no one can question their right so to do, however mistaken we, who have repeatedly witnessed such mistakes in the black pages of aviation since 1914, consider their decision; but after the last 20 months of outstanding success with the Civil Aeronautics Authority, I am sure the American people have no desire for their Congress so to do. Not one word favorable to the reorganization plan has appeared, so far as I know, in the press from east to west or north to south. Public opinion seems crystallized that Reorganization Plan IV, so far as aeronautics is concerned, is ill-advised, untimely, and not thought through.

The single important question is whether the general welfare which all of us seek can more certainly be attained under a Civil Aeronautics Authority as it now exists, or under the confused and nonunderstandable proposed Reorganization Plan IV.

What will it avail patriotic citizens to enter the service of our Government, temporarily or otherwise, to eliminate inefficient bureaucracy and to build up the public interest if, when the same is accomplished, the Congress of the United States is to permit them instantly to be cracked over the heads and rewarded by discouragement and demotion for the accomplishments they have realized? As Congressman LEA said on April 24, 1940:

> It is not good management to demote the general who comes home with victory.

If the Civil Aeronautics Authority in a short period of 20 months had done no more than to protect aeronautics from the hazards of bureaucracy, it would well have earned the gratitude of our Nation. Bureaucracy has never successfully operated as lawmaker, complainant, detective, prosecutor, witness, judge, jury, and executor.

Besides, the reorganization plan is not an economy plan. To over 930,000 employees in our Federal executive bureaucracy alone it will add additional personnel and require additional funds from the public exchequer.

Reorganization Plan No. IV is not in the public interest. [Applause.]

FEDERAL PAYMENT TO THE STATE OF OHIO

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under this leave to address the House I expect to try to show to the membership of the House just how grievously the President sinned against the rights of the people of Ohio when he vetoed the Jenkins bill which provided for the restitution to Ohio of the $1,338,000 which the Federal Government improperly withheld because of the quarrel that one of the Washington bureaucrats had with a Governor of Ohio who also was rather unreasonable.

Mr. Speaker, when the President, on January 24, vetoed the measure known as the Jenkins bill, H. R. 5118, he did the State of Ohio and its old-age pensioners a grave injustice. This injustice is so grave that the people of Ohio feel that it not only is a financial set-back of well over a million dollars but, much more important yet, it is a thrust at the life and honor of the State. It invades the rights of the State in a shocking manner. It is even more than a challenge of the sovereignty of a great State. It is a defiance of the sovereignty of that State. In effect it is a case of a bigoted chief of a Federal bureau robbing a great State and then defiantly saying, "What are you going to do about it?" The great State of Ohio can lose this large sum of money and still operate, but it cannot maintain its self-respect as a great State in an indissoluble union of great States if it permits this direct invasion of its rights as a sovereign State to go unchallenged. The mad race for power by Federal bureaucracy is the greatest threat to the perpetuity of the Republic today. When we permit one little bureau chief to distribute approximately one thousand million dollars per year or about $18,000,000 per month to about 1,800,000 of our aged people or to withhold it from them, we are placing too much power into the hands of that bureaucrat.

The veto power of a President comes directly from the Constitution. It is one of the most important powers given to the President by the Constitution. In effect, it gives him the power to approve or disapprove every action of Congress. It gives the Executive the power to supplant the wishes of the legislative branch of the Government with his own wishes. When a President supplants the wishes of Congress with his own wishes, that is in practical effect the tyranny of dictatorship. It was not the intention that this power was to be used by the President in every case where his wishes did not coincide with the views of Congress. The intent of the framers of the Constitution was to give to the Congress the right to control all matters of legislation. When the Congress assumes to pass upon a matter that is wholly within the purview of its powers and to pass upon it in accordance with its usual rules and procedure, the President should not disturb that action. He should not thrust his views upon the Nation as against 531 Representatives and Senators directly charged by the Constitution and the suffrages of the people to enact laws for the benefit of the Nation. But if the Congress should inadvertently pass a law without proper consideration or without the possession of all the facts, or if Congress should pass a law that invaded the prerogatives of the Executive or was clearly without the purview of the Constitution, or was so grossly unfair and unjust as to shock the conscience of reasonable men, then it would be the duty of the President to veto the same. As proof that the framers of the Constitution intended that the President should exercise great care and caution in affixing his veto, the Constitution requires the President to give his reasons in writing.

In the case in question the President did give in writing to Congress his reasons for his action. With all due respect to the President and his high office, his reasons do not rise to the dignity of reasons. I think if the President had known all the facts he would have approved the measure. His excuses for his veto are the same excuses that Mr. Altmeyer has advanced. I have no doubt that Mr. Altmeyer prepared all the material for the President's veto message. I have no doubt—and therefore I assert—that the President followed the advice of Mr. Altmeyer. In effect, in this case one little bureau chief was permitted to take advantage of a right which the framers of the Constitution gave to the President to be used so rarely as to be almost sacred. This in itself is a terrible situation. If this custom persists, our liberties are in great jeopardy. The life and strength of a State is its inherent sovereignty. When bureaucracy transcends State sovereignty, then the States are mere outposts of the dictatorship.

This tendency to bureaucratic dictation by the Federal Government has a tyrannical effect on the activities of State officials. I should like to recite an actual case that happened in Ohio which illustrates the effect that this bureaucratic dictation has had in Ohio on the activities of the old-age pension department. About 4 months ago there came to my office in my home city an aged man for whom I had acted as attorney in small matters for many years. He had been drawing an old-age pension and had been cut off. His removal was due, as the department claimed, to the fact that he had sold a small piece of property that had netted him about $300. In moving from the property he sold he contracted a severe illness, from which he was irrational at times during a period of 2 or 3 weeks. During that time his money disappeared. He did not know where it went. The local old-age representative was satisfied that the money had been stolen. The State department would not restore him to the rolls until they could make an investigation to determine the facts. The man was so ill in my office that I feared he would die, and I called a taxi and sent him home. He was then transferred to the public hospital, where in a short time he died. In the meantime the State department had through its legal division rendered me a long two- or three-page report showing why they could not restore him to the rolls. The burden of their objection was that they were afraid that the Federal Government would again cut off the Federal payments to Ohio as they had done previously. While this attorney was making his investigation and making his report, and upon the urgent insistence from myself, the State office sent down an inspector, who soon saw the situation and made his report to the effect that the aged man should be restored to the rolls. The department, fearful of Federal interference, hesitated to do so, but it finally took the chance and restored the aged man, but he died before he got any relief. Here is a case where the silly, unreasonable, dictatorial, tyrannical action of one little bureaucrat so frightened the officials of a great State as to deny to an aged man in the last few hours of his life his legal rights. This proves that the Federal Government should leave to the State administration all these small matters and should confine itself to carrying out the intent of the law.

Let us review briefly what the President has done. I shall not go into detail with all the facts in this paragraph, but I shall later. Suffice it to say that there was a controversy between the chief executive of the great State of Ohio and the chairman of a Federal bureau. The President held with the chairman, without any consultation with that Governor or his successor and without any consultation with any one of the 24 duly elected Members of Congress from that State, and in spite of the unanimous action of the Judiciary Committees of the House and Senate, and the unanimous action of the House and Senate in accordance with their regular procedure, and in spite of the favorable recommendation of the director of the department of which Altmeyer's bureau is only a small part. The President should not take refuge for an excuse in the fact that he is a busy man, for the regular way for him to have handled this measure would have been to have followed the recommendation of his director of the department in which the controversy arose and not of the chairman of one board. When a President ignores the action of Congress on a matter wholly within its jurisdiction, and ignores the recommendation of a director of a department in the Government appointed by himself, and refuses to see Members of Congress of his own political party who repeatedly request of his secretary that they be seen, with reference to a matter in which their constituents are vitally interested, and follows the advice of a mere chairman of a board who was notoriously antagonistic and partisan in the controversy which the President is about to decide, then I make bold to assert that the President has acted unwisely and that when he assumed to use his veto power in such a case he grossly abused that power.

Now, as to the facts and the law in this matter:

THE FACTS

Soon after the present administration commenced extending grants-in-aid to the States for relief purposes there arose a bitter official and personal controversy between Mr. Davey, the Governor of Ohio, and Mr. Hopkins, the Relief Director. This in spite of the fact that both affiliated with the Democratic Party. We are not concerned here with who was most at fault. Probably the best appraisal of it would be that both were at fault. This unfortunate animosity was carried into many of the State and Federal relationships.

The State of Ohio had been paying old-age pension for years before the Congress passed the social-security law, which provides in one of its titles that the Federal Government will, under certain conditions, match State contributions to aged people. The Federal law provided certain standards which the State of Ohio, through its legislature, promptly met. The State and Federal organizations cooperated nicely for some months when the fires of this animosity broke out in a new place. The charge of "politics" flew fast between them. The people of Ohio, in long-suffering silence, stood by and wondered, for they were helpless. A self-important, inexperienced, little chairman assumed to dictate to the Governor of a great State, giving no consideration to the fact that the State was great, regardless of what his opinion might have been of the Governor. The Governor claimed that so long as the legislature had passed laws to meet the Federal requirements and was matching its funds against the funds of the Federal Government that the chairman had no right to tell him how to administer that part of the program that he was responsible for and how to enforce the State laws, the enforcement of which was the province of the Governor. He was right in his contention. He probably could have been more tactful in his relationship with the chairman. The chairman, on the other hand, largely because of his inexperience in executive matters, claimed that there were irregularities in the selection of civil-service employees in Ohio. This might have been true. I maintain that under the Federel law and under the State law this is the responsibility of the State and not of the Federal Government. It is likely that the Governor could claim, with a fair chance of substantiation, that there were some irregularities somewhere in the Federal civil-service regulations, else a man with no executive ability would not have been made Chairman of the Social Security Board. In this conclusion many good people in Ohio would concur most heartily.

But the Governor would have no right to object. The point is that the Chairman of the Board has no authority to supervise the conduct of the Governor or State officials in this respect any more than the State officers can supervise the civil-service activities of the Federal Government. There were in 1938 about 111,000 aged persons in Ohio receiving old-age assistance. Under the rules in operation between the States and the Federal Government's Social Security Board the State makes the monthly payments and, when made and certified, the Federal Government comes forward with its portion. For instance, if Ohio was paying then, as it is paying now, an average of about $23 per month, it would pay to its 111,000 beneficiaries $2,553,000 per month. The Ohio authorities would certify this amount, then the Federal Treasury would pay one-half of it, plus 5 percent of that one-half for the expense of distribution. It is needless to say that to pay this number of people every month is a great task. Also there are many other problems that arise. For instance, the mortality rate is high among people of this advanced age. Suppose 1 percent of them would die each month. That would mean that 1,100 estates would have to be closed and that many pension checks would be returned unpaid. From this it is evident that the auditors of both agencies would have at the end of each month many accounts to balance and many items to investigate and to resolve. Thus an inexperienced chairman would have plenty of opportunity to find fault while an experienced executive would leave such matters to the officers of the respective groups charged with their particular duty. The payments were made every month until October 1938. The Chairman complained and the Governor complained also. I am thoroughly familiar with the correspondence between them. Both were to blame for quarreling about small matters. None of the contentions between them amounted to a substantial contention. The Chairman should have remembered that the Governor was beholden to an electorate that would and did control his activities by defeating him at the election. The Governor should have realized that he was dealing with a man too small for his job.

The President should have realized this also and removed him. But since this was not done, the Chairman proceeded to exceed his authority and stopped the payment for October 1938. He allowed the payment for September and again after the November elections he allowed the November payment. If he was justified in paying in September and again in November, he should be able to show that there was some special difference in the situation in October. This he cannot do. It cannot be done. If he could show that the Governor had played politics by adding additional persons to the pay roll as was done in so many places on W. P. A., or if he could show that the Governor had misappropriated some of the money, he might justify his action. On the contrary there were 200 fewer persons on the rolls in October than in September and no charge had been made at any time that the Governor or anybody else misappropriated any money. There was no change in the law between September and November, for the legislature had not met. The deputy auditor of State, a Democrat, listed as unfriendly to the Governor, stated at the hearing before the Judiciary Committee of the House that there was no material change of any kind in the manner and method of handling the matter in November as against September and October. The facts do not justify the President's veto. The reasonable conclusion that Ohio people quite generally have come to is that the President has permitted himself to be brought into this petty political quarrel between a Governor whom the people defeated and a little, inexperienced chairman who should be sent back to the classroom. It cost the people of Ohio $1,338,168 to watch this childish quarrel. The President may not think this is much money, but we in Ohio still think it is a lot of money.

THE LAW IN THE CASE

I maintain that the Board had no authority in law to withhold permanently all of the money in question. Acting on this theory I immediately tried to induce the Board to reconsider its action. It refused to do so although all through the month following its decision it attempted to induce the Governor to resume negotiations with them. The Board refused to consider an adjustment although it had done so in the Oklahoma case, which was far more serious than the Ohio case. Mr. Altmeyer, the Chairman of the Board, was in fact the whole Board. In his imperious way he announced that his actions were immutable. I reminded him that the Medes and Persians, too, thought that their laws were immutable but they and their laws are long since forgotten, and that simple justice is the only attribute of law that is eternal. I read you the law, and you may be the judge:

SEC. 2. (a) A State plan for old-age assistance must (1) provide that it shall be in effect in all political subdivisions of the State, and if administered by them, be mandatory upon them; (2) provide for financial participation by the State; (3) either provide for the establishment or designation of a single State agency to administer the plan, or provide for the establishment or designation of a single State agency to supervise the administration of the plan; (4) provide for granting to any individual, whose claim for old-age assistance is denied, an opportunity for a fair hearing before such State agency; (5) provide such methods of administration (other than those relating to selection, tenure of office, and compensation of personnel) as are found by the Board to be necessary for the efficient operation of the plan; (6) provide that the State agency will make such reports, in such form and containing such information, as the Board may from time to time require, and comply with such provisions as the Board may from time to time find necessary to assure the correctness and verification of such reports; and (7) provide that, if the State or any of its political subdivisions collects from the estate of any recipient of old-age assistance any amount with respect to old-age assistance furnished him under the plan, one-half of the net amount so collected shall be promptly paid to the United States. Any payment so made shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation for the purposes of this title.

(b) The Board shall approve any plan which fulfills the condition specified in subsection (a), except that it shall not approve any plan which imposes, as a condition of eligibility for old-age assistance under the plan—

(1) An age requirement of more than 65 years, except that the plan may impose, effective until January 1, 1940, an age requirement of as much as 70 years; or

(2) Any residence requirement which excludes any resident of the State who has resided therein 5 years during the 9 years immediately preceding the application for old-age assistance and has resided therein continuously for 1 year immediately preceding the application; or

(3) Any citizenship requirement which excludes any citizen of the United States.

SEC. 4. In the case of any State plan for old-age assistance which has been approved by the Board, if the Board, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing to the State agency administering or supervising the administration of such plan, finds—

(1) That the plan has been so changed as to impose any age, residence, or citizenship requirement prohibited by section 2 (b), or that in the administration of the plan any such prohibited requirement is imposed, with the knowledge of such State agency, in a substantial number of cases; or

(2) That in the administration of the plan there is a failure to comply substantially with any provision required by section 2 (a) to be included in the plan.

The Board shall notify such State agency that further payments will not be made to the State until the Board is satisfied that such prohibited requirement is no longer so imposed, and that there is no longer any such failure to comply. Until it is so satisfied it shall make no further certification to the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to such State.

You will notice that section 2 provides the requirements which the States must fulfill. Ohio did this to the letter. It was easy to do, for Ohio already had been paying old-age pensions on the average of about $15 per month for some time.

Section 4 is the section to which I wish to call your special attention. In substance the section states that if the Board finds that the plans have been changed, and so forth—which is not the case in this controversy—or that in the administration of the plan there is a failure to comply "substantially" that the Board shall notify the State that further payments will not be made to the State "until" the Board is satisfied that such failure no longer exists. I should have you note the word "until." This means that the Board may withhold "until" something happens and not permanently. If Congress meant permanently, it would have said so. Surely the power to confiscate this large sum of money is not lodged in this Board. This would be more power than the President or any court in the land has. This surely could not amount to what in law is known as a forfeiture. If the Board is correct in its interpretation in Ohio's case, how could it possibly be correct in the Oklahoma case? If it was right in withholding October's payment, it was wrong in paying for September and November.

Even if the Board cannot change its orders, that is no reason for this veto. It was because the Board refused to pay or to change its order that I introduced the bill. I did so to relieve the situation. I was interested in making it easy for the Board to do justice.

Now, the real question in the whole matter is, If the Board cannot as the law stands now make the certification, then Congress should do so by legislation. Can it be possible that one little chairman of a little board in Washington can trample justice in the dust, and lay a heavy fine on a great State of the greatest union of States that the world ever saw? Since when have we, a free people who take great pride in our courts and juries, in our Congress and Senate, come to such a low estate that one man can be judge and jury over our rights, and can be House and Senate over our liberties? How can a President who lends himself to such childish petulancy claim to be entitled to the confidence of the people to such an extent that they will give him what Washington would not ask for, and what Jefferson would not have, and what Jackson would have resented? Justice, like truth, when crushed to earth shall rise again. What one President wrongfully refuses to do another President may gladly do. One little bureaucrat cannot stop a righteous cause. The greatness of Ohio is the indomitable spirit of her people. She will win with justice and time as her allies. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein excerpts from the hearings before the Committee on Public Lands and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert a letter from H. M. Hill and also from the Minnesota Highway Users Conference regarding the bill S. 2009, expressing their opposition thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD on two subjects.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST GRADUATES OF CERTAIN SCHOOLS

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 478) for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 478

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of S. 1610, an act to prevent discrimination against graduates of certain schools, and those acquiring their legal education in law offices in the making of appointments to Government positions the qualifications for which include legal training or legal experience. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Civil Service, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

REORGANIZATION OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT

Mr. DELANEY, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 469) for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 469

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 9266, a bill providing for the reorganization of the Navy Department, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendments under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR

Mr. DELANEY, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 479) for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 479

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 217, a joint resolution to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing Federal participation in the New York World's Fair, 1939, and for other purposes," approved July 9, 1937. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and to include certain extracts from Government reports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on two subjects.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 91]

Beam	Hill	Osmers	Steagall
Burgin	Jarman	Patrick	Taylor
Chapman	Jarrett	Plumley	Ward
Clason	Johnson, W. Va.	Reece, Tenn.	Weaver
Coffee, Wash.	Kirwan	Rogers, Okla.	Whelchel
Corbett	Lemke	Routzohn	White, Idaho
Culkin	McLaughlin	Sandager	White, Ohio
Darrow	Maas	Schulte	Wood
Durham	Merritt	Sheridan
Gilchrist	Myers	Smith, Va.
Green	Nelson	Starnes, Ala.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this roll call 389 Members have answered, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I understand there is a likelihood that this bill may not be finished today, and that there is also the possibility there might be some change in the program for the rest of the week. I would like to inquire of the Speaker pro tempore if he can inform the House now what the order of business will be for the next few days?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that only this morning the Chair conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], who is in charge of the agricultural appropriation bill. Not knowing whether or not the wage-hour amendments would be disposed of today or run into tomorrow, and in view of the fact that the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill when it does come up will probably take a day or more, and the further fact that we are very anxious on Friday to dispose of the conference report on the transportation bill, it has been decided that the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill will not be called up this week.

As to the order of business for tomorrow should the wage-hour amendments be finished today, the Chair will advise the gentleman from Massachusetts and the membership later in the day.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. On what day next week will the agricultural conference report be called up for consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Probably on Tuesday, and certainly not later than Wednesday.

AMENDMENTS TO FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5435) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5435) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. As I understand the parliamentary situation, the committee substitute is now before the Committee for consideration. The so-called Norton bill is subject to amendment, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The parliamentary situation is that the committee substitute for the original bill, H. R. 5435, is now before the Committee, but no agreement has been reached as to how the substitute shall be read for amendment.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the substitute be open for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It certainly will be open for amendment.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. And if any amendment is adopted to the substitute can we get a separate vote on that amendment when we get back into the House?

The CHAIRMAN. There cannot be a separate vote in the House on amendments to the substitute.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That is what I mean. It must be voted up or down in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. With all deference to the Chair, there was a unanimous-consent agreement on yesterday that the bill would be considered section by section for amendment just as the Barden bill was.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. Unanimous consent was given that the reading of the substitute should be dispensed with and that it would be considered today for amendment under the same conditions as the Barden bill was.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. That is by sections?

The CHAIRMAN. By sections.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. After the substitute has been considered for amendment, the only vote that can be had on the substitute in the House is on the substitute as a whole without a separate vote on any amendment adopted to the substitute. Is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. If the substitute amendment is adopted in the Committee of the Whole, the vote in the House will occur on the substitute as amended.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Only?

The CHAIRMAN. No separate vote may be had on any amendment to the substitute.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from New Jersey is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we have spent 2 days in debating this bill and we are now just about where we were in the beginning of the debate. Nothing in particular has been gained by the debate that could not have been gained had we considered H. R. 5435 and amended it. I believe that every Member of this House knows now just how he intends to vote on this bill. I believe, too, that the Members of the House realize the importance of passing a bill this year so that many people who now come under this act will be relieved. For this reason I appeal to you today not to offer amendments that will be rejected. You have a pretty fair idea from the debate that has been going on how the House feels, for instance, about paying 30 cents an hour to a worker. That question has been well debated, and I am very proud of the fact that the House of Representatives went on record yesterday as not approving a bill that would take from the poorest workers in this country a miserable 30 cents an hour. That, in effect, was the principal difference between my bill and the Barden bill. That matter having been disposed of by a definite vote against substituting the Barden amendment, as well as a great many other amendments that were offered and would have destroyed the effect of the law, we are now in position to go on and help improve the act, not destroy it.

Mr. Chairman, there are many more exemptions in the substitute bill reported by the committee than I myself would like to have seen there. I am unalterably opposed to exempting anyone from 30 cents an hour. So at the proper time there will be an amendment offered to strike out, on page 15, section 13 (a) down to section 6. I hope the Committee will agree to that amendment. There are various other amendments that I believe may be offered to improve the law. The provision on page 15, under the subtitle (e), is a very good one. This provision protects employers when they accept the order of the Administrator, which heretofore might not be had under the law. There are a few other amendments that will be offered which I think will probably help in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. NORTON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think the observation made about the debate is a very pertinent one. Certainly prolonging the debate unnecessarily is not going to place the House of Representatives in a very satisfactory light with the people of the country. We have had 2 days' debate. I am hopeful that the gentlewoman from New Jersey will submit a unanimous-consent request that all debate on the Norton bill and the substitute and all amendments thereto close at 3:30, 4 o'clock, or 4:30, or somewhere around there. I do not see any reason why anybody should object to that, in view of the unlimited debate which we have had and I hope that such unanimous-consent request is offered. I have no suggestion as to the particular time to close debate. It may be 3:30, 4, 4:30, or even 5 o'clock, but I hope that we may have an agreement sometime today as to when debate will close. This will not preclude amendments being offered if the time expires.

Mrs. NORTON. I may say in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the chairman intended to submit that unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. NORTON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUCK. I endeavored to catch the meaning of the gentlewoman's suggestion that she would offer an amendment to strike out, as I understood it, the language on page 15 beginning in line 15 through line 4 on page 16. Is that correct?

Mrs. NORTON. That is right. That is the only part of the bill that exempts the wage provisions of the act.

Mr. BUCK. In other words, the gentlewoman desires to withdraw such protection as now exists to agricultural labor entirely?

Mrs. NORTON. Oh, now, the gentleman knows perfectly well what I have in mind.

Mr. BUCK. I do not know. I am asking the gentlewoman whether she wants to do that or not?

Mrs. NORTON. I stated very plainly I intended to offer an amendment to strike out the section. Now, I only yielded for a question, not to argue.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. NORTON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is my interpretation, and it is the interpretation of a great many Members, that the part of the bill that the chairman is proposing to offer an amendment to strike leaves out this so-called area-of-production provision in the original act.

Mrs. NORTON. That is true, and the area-of-production provision is left out in the substitute.

Mr. RAYBURN. If 13 (a) is adopted?

Mrs. NORTON. Exactly.

Mr. RAYBURN. I thought the gentlewoman was going to offer an amendment to strike out 13 (a) in its entirety?

Mrs. NORTON. I misunderstood the gentleman's question.

Mr. RAYBURN. Just what does the gentlewoman from New Jersey intend to strike out?

Mrs. NORTON. I intend to strike from the wage provision of the bill all of those things that are listed in section 5 (B)—(11), (12), and (13) of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. All right. I went into this with members of the committee yesterday, and I think one of the most nonsensical features of all this law has been the interpretation of the two Administrators in connection with the so-called area-of-production proposal. [Applause.]

Mrs. NORTON. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. RAYBURN. Several months ago I sought to get one of the Administrators, the first one in the first instance, and the second one in the second instance, to do something about that. In the farming sections of this country that has been the most irritating part of the whole law, and I think its administration has been utter nonsense. I hope the gentlewoman from New Jersey will not move to strike from this bill a provision that repeals that command for an area-of-production regulation, as the Administrator says.

Mrs. NORTON. I do not quite understand.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will my chairman point out to me what language in the bill she suggests be stricken out?

Mrs. NORTON. Page 15, line 15, section 13 (a) down to and including "tobacco", in line 4, on page 16.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I am sure the gentlewoman from New Jersey has not considered the fact that if this language is stricken out the area of production is restored to the law. I am quite certain that is not what the gentlewoman intends to do.

Mrs. NORTON. That was not my understanding.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Therefore, I suggest that what she probably had in mind was to begin with (11), dealing with telephone operators, and strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mrs. NORTON. Of course the telephone exemption has already been taken care of by law.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Such a law has been passed, but the gentlewoman sees that the language in lines 15 and 16 is the language which repeals the area of production in section 13 (a). I am quite sure the chairman of the committee does not intend that the committee bill have eliminated from it the repeal of the area of production. It would be contrary to what we are trying to do.

Mrs. NORTON. I agree with the gentleman entirely in that.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Then the gentlewoman does not want to strike from this committee substitute the language in lines 15, 16, and the first part of 17, which states—

Section 13 (a) of such act is further amended by striking out clause 10, and inserting in lieu thereof the following.

Clause (10) is the clause which contains the area of production.

Mrs. NORTON. The gentleman is correct. I see I have made a mistake. The amendment that will be offered will strike out, on page 15, line 18, all after the word "or" down through and including the word "tobacco", on page 16, line 4.

Mr. RAMSPECK. There are four provisions there which eliminate both wages and hours. One deals with the ginning of cotton, the second deals with the small telephone exchanges, the third deals with fruits and vegetables in their raw or natural state, and the fourth deals with the tobacco situation. The remainder of this section simply repeals the present provision as to the area of production. I am sure the chairman does not want to strike that out.

Mrs. NORTON. No; the gentleman is correct. As I stated before, I was a bit confused about the line.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield in order that I may ask the gentleman from Georgia a question?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes; I will be glad to yield.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. If that is done, will not that strike out every exemption now granted to agriculture in 13 (a), subsection (10)?

Mrs. NORTON. Oh, no.

Mr. RAMSPECK. No; you only strike out clause (10).

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Clause (10) includes all. Just read it. This is clause (10):

To any individual employed within the area of production (as defined by the Administrator) engaged in handling, packing, storing, ginning, compressing, pasteurizing——

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield for a speech. What we intend to do is to strike out on page 15, line 18, after the word "or", down through and including the word "tobacco", on page 16, line 4. I believe that takes care of the matter.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Just to clarify that, does the gentlewoman mean beginning with subsection (11) of subsection (b)?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That clarifies it.

Mrs. NORTON. That is exactly what I mean.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Beginning on line 18 of page 15, with the figure (11), strike out the remainder of the paragraph?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes.

May I say, Mr. Chairman, that my only intention in striking this out is to prevent any worker from getting less than 30 cents an hour. I am entirely in accord with the gentleman that the area of production should be stricken out. It is ambiguous. Nobody has ever been able to give an answer to what the area of production is, and we would be very glad to get it out of our bill.

May I say further that we do not mean to cut off debate, but we feel that this bill has been discussed thoroughly. Everybody has had a chance to express themselves on it. The question at issue is whether the Congress of the United States wants to pay less than 30 cents an hour to any worker employed in the United States. We have made a very large exemption on hours, believing that the main object of the law is to protect the wages of the workers. We were perfectly willing to concede that there were certain fresh fruits, vegetables, and so forth, or those things included in farming, for which, perhaps, because of seasonal conditions, longer hours should be permitted. You will find in the bill a complete exemption of 14 weeks on hours. Then the exemption for the rest of the year is 60 hours a week. We feel that this will take care of any farmer in the country, but we are unalterably opposed to reducing the wage. Thirty cents an hour is a very small amount for any man or woman to receive in wages. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if the Members have the committee bill before them, H. R. 5435, they will find on page 15, in line 15, subsection (b) of section (5) of the committee substitute, proposes to repeal clause (10) of section 13 (a) of the original act. Clause (10) of section 13 (a) reads as follows:

To any individual employed within the area of production (as defined by the Administrator), engaged in handling, packing, storing, ginning, compressing, pasteurizing, drying, preparing in their raw or natural state, or canning of agricultural or horticultural commodities for market, or in making cheese or butter or other dairy products.

Under the present law these operations, if within the area of production as defined by the Administrator, are exempt from both wages and hours under the Fair Labor Standards Act. The committee substitute would repeal that provision and substitute for it the language of the committee substitute which puts some of those operations under the wage provision but gives them a 60-hour week.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Not just now.

Then, in addition to that, in the language of this amendment any employee engaged in the ginning of cotton would still be exempted from both wages and hours. In the committee amendment, as printed in the bill, also would be exempted from both wages and hours telephone operators in small exchanges, employees engaged in cleaning, packing, grading, or preparing fresh fruits and fresh vegetables in their raw or natural state when such operations are performed immediately off the farm; and employees employed in handling, tying, drying, stripping, grading, redrying, fermenting, stemming or packing, when those operations are performed prior to storage, and storing leaf tobacco.

If I understood the chairman of the committee, she proposes to eliminate from this subsection (b) of section 5 the telephone-operator exemption, the fresh fruit and vegetables exemption, and the tobacco exemption.

I will ask the gentlewoman from New Jersey if I am correct in interpreting what she proposes to do. Is this a correct statement of what you propose to do?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes; that is a correct statement.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. If that is true, then the only thing left in the way of an exemption to agriculture in section 10—which is the section you read and named, having to do with vegetables, ginning, milk, and all those things—is the ginning of cotton, and agriculture loses all the rest. Is not that a correct statement?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct, insofar as subsection 10 of section 13 (a) is concerned.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. That is the only one that deals directly with the matter and relieves them from the wages and hours.

Mr. RAMSPECK. There are a good many other exemptions in section 13.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. In other words, if the amendment suggested is adopted, agriculture would lose practically every exemption that now exists in the law. Is not that right?

Mr. RAMSPECK. It certainly would lose a good many of them. I would not say the gentleman's statement is entirely correct.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. NORTON. Is it not a fact they would simply lose the wage provision and not the hour provision?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is not entirely correct, I will say to my chairman, because there is no hour provision with reference to the tobacco sections, unless you expect to offer an amendment putting them under the 60-hour week. They are not now under it.

Mrs. NORTON. May I say to the gentleman that it is my intention to extend the same exemption as applicable to the other classifications mentioned in the list of hours exemptions.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I want to say to the Committee, quite frankly, speaking for myself and not for the committee, I am not in favor of eliminating the exemption for the fresh fruit and vegetables and the seasonal products. They certainly are entitled to an exemption under this act, in my judgment.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. As a matter of fact, is it not true that in the bill approved by the committee and printed by the chairman of the committee in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 5, 1939, page 7 of the bill, clause 12, the area of production as to the cleaning, grading, and packing of fresh fruits and vegetables was completely removed on the assumption that that was a submarginal industry which could not stand any additional expense?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I will say to the gentleman, it is removed in the committee substitute that we are just talking about if it is adopted.

Mr. ROBERTSON. No; it is not as broad as you had it in the other provisions, because in the committee substitute that you mention and that the chairman now seeks to strike out you have the words "if performed immediately off the farm."

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. ROBERTSON. But in the bill reported last year—and I propose at the proper time——

Mr. RAMSPECK. I hope the gentleman will not go into too much detail about that. I have not the bill before me, and I do not recall the language.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. PEARSON. I understood the gentlewoman from New Jersey to say that if her amendment were adopted, that the operation set out in subsection 10 of section 13 would only be affected as to hours. Is it not true that section 13 in its entirety constitutes an exemption both from wages and hours?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. PEARSON. And if her amendment be adopted, every farm operation set out in subsection 10 will then be taken out of the exemptions and be amenable to the 30-cent provision so far as those operations are concerned.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is correct.

Mr. PEARSON. That would result in our placing of farm labor employed in these operations under the provisions of the Wage and Hour Act.

Mr. RAMSPECK. No; I do not agree with that statement, because farm labor is exempt otherwise; but the language of this subsection B is such that unless a further amendment is offered to put these operations under the liberal hours contained in this bill, then, of course, they would be subject to both the wage provisions and the hour provisions of existing law.

Mr. PEARSON. Is the amendment suggested by the gentlewoman from New Jersey a committee amendment, or is that her individual amendment?

Mr. RAMSPECK. As far as I know, it is not a committee amendment.

Mrs. NORTON. I thought I made it clear that it is not a committee amendment. I was merely giving my own opinion.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Would not the gentleman accomplish his purpose if the words which he has referred to on page 15 were stricken out at that point, and inserted on page 13 after line 11? If a new subsection numbered 17 were made, then we would be exempting these operations from the hours provision but not from the wage provision.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct. That is what I suggested a while ago, that unless a further amendment be adopted, giving them increased hours, they would be subject both to the wage provisions and the hour provisions of existing law.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think, in the observation made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] calling attention to the original bill or the committee bill of last year and the present bill from the committee, that the distinction he draws between area of production and immediately off the farm was written into the law in an attempt to help the situation from the standpoint of the area of production, and was offered as an amendment by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON], and yet we found we were running into the same difficulty with that language that we were running into with the area of production, as interpreted in the rulings of the Administrator.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. TARVER. The question I had in mind was that no matter what we do with clause 10, still we would have other exceptions in the wage and hour provisions included in clause 6, which exempts anyone employed purely in agriculture.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct, and may I emphasize that, in view of the question asked by the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Pearson, that clause 6 of section 13 (a) exempts from both wages and hours any employee employed in agriculture; and that must be read in connection with the definition of agriculture, which includes any employee working for a farmer engaged in farming operations or anything incident to farming and also includes the raising of livestock, bees, fur-bearing animals, or poultry, and any person engaged in forestry or lumbering operations performed by the farm on the farm as an incident thereto or in conjunction with such farming operations, including preparation for market, and delivery to storage or to market or to carriers for transportation to market, which is a wide exemption in itself.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. WELCH. May I ask my colleague on the committee if I understood him to say that he objects to striking out section 13 of the bill, which would give to the workers included in the section 30 cents per hour, as provided in the act?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman did not entirely understand me. I said I objected to subjecting the employees engaged in cleaning, packing, grading, or preparing fresh fruits or vegetables in their raw or natural state. I think they ought to have complete exemption, because it is a seasonal operation.

Mr. WELCH. From both wages and hours?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes, sir; I think so. That is just my own personal opinion.

Mr. WELCH. Why should they be exempted from the hourly wage of 30 cents, or $12 a week?

Mr. RAMSPECK. As I understand the proposal, it is to exempt the preparing of them for market, which is paid for by the farmer. As I stated earlier in this debate, I am willing to exempt anything that comes out of the pocket of the farmer if it can be shown that it comes out of his pocket. Beyond that I am not willing to exempt anybody from the wages provision.

Mr. WELCH. Has it been shown that the increase provided for in the law for those engaged in processing plants comes out of the pockets of the farmers?

Mr. RAMSPECK. But this language does not include any processing. It says "packing, cleaning, grading, or preparing fresh fruits or vegetables in their raw or natural state." That certainly cannot include any processing, as I understand the language.

Mr. WELCH. If that is the case, may I say to my colleague they are already protected, inasmuch as all farm labor is exempted under the law. They are either farm laborers or processors.

Mr. RAMSPECK. If the gentleman and I were construing the language of this act I would agree with him, but neither the gentleman nor I can construe it after it leaves this body. I think the definition of "agriculture" covers these operations.

Mr. WELCH. I submit to my friend that they are either one or the other. They are either exempt as agricultural or farm employees, or else they work in industry. The question is whether, as employees in an industry, they are entitled to 30 cents an hour—$12 a week.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from California, Mr. BUCK.

Mr. BUCK. May I say in response to the remarks of my colleague from California [Mr. WELCH] that he knows that unless my redefinition of "agriculture," an amendment that I propose to offer, is adopted by the House, the employees of small operators engaged in the packaging and processing of fruits will not be exempted under the act. They are not engaged in industry. They are engaged in preparing raw and fresh fruits and vegetables for the market.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to my friend from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The question I wanted to ask is simply this: It seems to me the Committee on Labor itself does not understand this bill, for they all have different interpretations of it. We hear it right here. How can the Members of the House correct this bill without understanding what the different amendments mean when the committee itself interprets them differently? I think it would be wise to refer this bill back to the committee for further study. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Now, let me say to the gentleman from New York, for whom I have the highest regard, that I agree with him that it is a difficult bill to interpret. Any bill is difficult to interpret when there are a lot of definitions that must be kept in mind and when words mean only what they are defined to mean in the law. That is what we have here. That is what causes the confusion about it. But I do not agree with the gentleman from New York when he says we should recommit this bill. We spent months working on this bill and it is the best we can do. If you send it back, we will not be able, with the present Labor Committee, to bring in any better bill than we have right now.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. I have just one interest in this bill, and I am sure the other Members feel very much the same way.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I hope the gentleman will make it a question now, because my time is limited.

Mr. REED of New York. We are bringing in a bill here and apparently there is a great deal of misunderstanding about it. We all have our problems. My farmers in a fruit district are absolutely dependent for their market upon these small processing plants. What holds true there holds true, I assume, in your section and many other sections of the country. It is very difficult to understand exactly where they are going to stand under the language of this bill.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I can only give my own interpretation. Other gentlemen, of course, might differ with me.

I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON].

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will not this amendment do what we have been assured this bill does—eliminate "area production" by striking out the present paragraph 10, reinserting it just as it is, leaving agriculture just as it is in the existing law, and eliminating the controversial words, to wit, "employed within the area of production," as defined by the Administrator? If we reenact that law, leaving out those controversial words, we leave agriculture just as it is under the present law.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Of course, the result of that would be to subject the employers to court tests to determine whether the court said they were within the area of production.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. That eliminates it altogether.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. What is the meaning of the phrase "immediately off the farm"? Does it mean time or space?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I will say to the gentleman frankly that I voted against that in the committee. I do not know what it means. I think it would be just as problematical as "area of production," and I hope the language will be stricken from the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. Is it not a fact that if those words are stricken from the bill it will exempt from both wages and hours all of those agricultural processes enumerated?

Mr. RAMSPECK. If the phrase "area of production as defined by the Administrator" were taken out of the present law, then it would read "That any individual engaged in handling, packing, storing, ginning, compressing, pasteurizing, drying," and so forth, would be completely exempt from both wages and hours no matter where located; and, of course, it would include a great many very large operators.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Subsection (13) referring to tobacco contains the language:

When those operations are performed prior to storage.

Does that mean storage on the farm or storage after it has been processed? In some cases the grower processes the tobacco—I mean gets it into final shape for sale.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I am not an expert on tobacco by any means, but it is my understanding that it means prior to its sale by the farmer.

Mr. MILLER. Would it not be better if the period came before the phrase "prior to storage"? If you dry and store leaf tobacco you are processing it.

Mr. RAMSPECK. As I understand it leaf tobacco has to be stored for a while and cured before it can be sold.

Mr. MILLER. It is stored in the tobacco barns on the farm, then after the first damp comes it is moved for further processing. I am concerned to know where the line should be drawn.

Mr. RAMSPECK. That, of course, is one of the difficulties about writing this sort of exemption into the act. Unless you know the operations of the industry involved it is hard to know whether you are going too far.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. LANDIS. I believe if you would strike out the language on lines 2, 3, and 4 on page 12 you would give agriculture the hours provision that is necessary. If you are interested in exempting them from hours that is the place to put in the amendment, but if you want wages and hours both, then you will have to place the amendment at the point the gentleman offered it. I would like to know if the House is interested in hours, or in wages and hours.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I, of course, cannot answer that question.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I want to ask the gentleman, who is well informed about this bill, with reference to preparing honey for market. What provision is there to take care of that? The honey producers are in the same position as the fresh-vegetable farmer. Is there any exemption with reference to persons engaged in the production of honey?

Mr. RAMSPECK. If it is done by a farmer. The raising of bees is exempt as a farming operation if it is done by a farmer under the definition of agriculture. The language of the committee substitute exempts the making of honey up to 60 hours per week from overtime, that is the preparing and selling. It would be subject to the wage provision.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. But not to hours.

Mr. RAMSPECK. They would have a 60-hour week.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. I want to make it very clear that it is our intention if section 13, line 18, commencing with No. 11 on page 15 is stricken out, that those exempted under that section will be added to the section on page 13, line 11, in a new paragraph.

Mr. RAMSPECK. And the purpose of the gentlewoman from New Jersey is to take away the exemption of wages only and give them the 60-hour week.

Mrs. NORTON. Exactly, that is my only intention.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I hope the House understands that clearly.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Both the chairman of the Committee on Labor and the gentleman from Georgia have stated that they are interested in protecting the 30-cents-an-hour wage provision and that they would not agree to anything that would place that in jeopardy. On page 17 of the bill is a provision to the effect that the Administrator shall promulgate regulations permitting the employment in rural areas of employees in the home at such wages lower than the minimum wage applicable under section 6; and it goes on further to give him discretion to determine whether or not there is unfair competitive advantage or whether it would lead to curtailment of employment. Does not that place the minimum wage in jeopardy?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not think so. I am familiar with that situation. I think it is a very wise provision.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I do not agree with the gentleman.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to announce that all those members of the Committee who have bona fide amendments to offer will please bring them to the desk so that they may be properly cataloged and the Chair will then endeavor to recognize everyone who has a bona fide amendment pending.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the committee substitute and all amendments thereto close at 4 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BUCK and Mr. GROSS objected.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 1 is now open for amendment.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCK: At the end of the enacting clause insert a new section to read as follows:

SECTION 1. Section 3 (f) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended to read as follows: "Agriculture" includes farming in all its branches and includes all service performed—

"(1) On a farm, in the employ of any person, in connection with cultivating the soil or in connection with raising or harvesting any agricultural or horticultural commodity, including the raising, shearing, feeding, caring for, training, and management of livestock, bees, poultry, and fur-bearing animals and wildlife.

"(2) In the employ of the owner or tenant or other operator of a farm, in connection with the operation, management, conservation, improvement, or maintenance of such farm and its tools and equipment, or in salvaging timber or clearing land of brush and other debris left by a hurricane, if the major part of such service is performed on a farm.

"(3) In connection with the production or harvesting of maple sirup or maple sugar or any commodity defined as an agricultural commodity in section 15 (g) of the Agricultural Marketing Act, as amended, or in connection with the raising or harvesting of mushrooms, or in connection with the hatching of poultry, or in connection with the ginning of cotton, or in connection with the operation or maintenance of ditches, canals, reservoirs, or waterways used exclusively for supplying and storing water for farming purposes.

"(4) In handling, planting, drying, packing, packaging, processing, freezing, grading, storing, or delivering to storage or to market or to a carrier for transportation to market, any agricultural or horticultural commodity; but only if such service is performed as an incident to ordinary farming operations or, in the case of fruits and vegetables, as an incident to the preparation of such fruits or vegetables for market. The provisions of this paragraph shall not be deemed to be applicable with respect to service performed in connection with commercial canning or commercial freezing or in connection with any agricultural or horticultural commodity after its delivery to a terminal market for distribution for consumption.

"As used in this subsection, the term 'farm' includes stock, dairy, poultry, fruit, fur-bearing animal, and truck farms, plantations, ranches, nurseries, ranges, greenhouses, or other similar structures used primarily for the raising of agricultural or horticultural commodities, and orchards."

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK]?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. WELCH. Is the amendment that the gentleman has just offered identical with the amendment he offered yesterday to the Barden bill?

Mr. BUCK. It is.

Mr. WELCH. Which was almost unanimously voted down?

Mr. BUCK. I do not think it was unanimously voted down. I may say to the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH], I did not ask for a division at that time because I realized that the real vote would come on the bill of the gentlewoman from New Jersey. I intend to press this amendment vigorously, and I am going to ask everyone to support it wholeheartedly.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me from the discussion that has taken place that it is quite obvious the question of what is agriculture is the fundamental proposition we are debating today. There is no one who has been more devoted to the principles of getting justice for labor than myself. I do not intend to pat myself on the back by that statement, but anyone can look in the RECORD to see how I have voted on various labor questions in this House. I know what agriculture is because I was born on a farm, and I have been engaged in agriculture all my life. There is a very great difference between agricultural labor and industrial labor. May I say to my friends on the right and left that we have here a proposition to define more or less accurately what agricultural labor is. The definition does not affect industrial labor in any way, and is specifically made inapplicable to even the commercial canning or freezing of perishable commodities.

Now, we had the same problem before the Ways and Means Committee. We were confronted with rulings from the Bureau of Internal Revenue with respect to the agricultural labor under the Social Security Act. These made rather curious distinctions. Labor engaged in raising poultry or eggs for market, for instance, was regarded as agricultural labor, but if that same labor was engaged in raising baby chicks it was not agricultural labor. Now, tell me the reason for the difference, if you will. Labor used in raising mushrooms in a cellar was agricultural labor, but if that labor was used in raising mushrooms up in a cave it was not agricultural labor. Tell me the difference.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. In just a second.

Mr. Chairman, our committee decided that it was necessary to define what agricultural labor was. We asked Congress to do so, and it did. I am very sorry that it is necessary to define what agriculture or agricultural labor is under this act; however, it is absolutely essential for the reason that in the various departments the men who are employed in making rulings, for example, in the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the Wage and Hour Division, and the National Labor Relations Board have no familiarity at all with agriculture. We must put up a chart for the Administrator to run by, and there is no authority other than the Congress that can put up that chart.

The gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER] intimated the other day in his speech that I did not know where this amendment came from. Of all the Members of the House of Representatives, I certainly know where it came from. The original definition, comprising at least subsections 1 and 4 of my amendment, came out of a definition that was agreed upon and promulgated under the N. R. A. a long time ago. Those sections came out of the N. R. A. regulations that were adopted, approved, and promulgated by the President of the United States.

Section 15 (g), which is in the second subdivision of this amendment, was adopted and is a part of the present wage-hour law. The gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON], when she moved to suspend the rules a year ago, offered almost the same language, or, at least, language to the same effect as my subdivision (4). This will be developed, I hope, by a subsequent speaker, so I shall not take any time on it.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. NORTON. What the gentleman just said is probably true, but since that time the chairman of the Labor Committee has had a great deal more information on the subject.

Mr. BUCK. Of course, if the gentlewoman has had a change of heart, I cannot help it, but I would like to discuss the amendment she proposed earlier this afternoon when the time comes. Naturally, I am opposed to it entirely. I do not see any reason why the fruit and vegetable growers of the United States should be discriminated against by her amendment as far as being eliminated from agriculture is concerned.

Now, let me get back to my own amendment. People employed in agriculture are exempt under the present act. Subparagraph (6) of subsection (a) of section 13 of the act does that. But what is agriculture? That is the question that has been disturbing every farmer in the United States and has been disturbing everyone else. The other amendments in the Norton bill go to the question of canneries, they go to the question of meat-packing houses, and they go to a lot of other things. I am speaking here today only on behalf of the farmer himself; I am speaking primarily on behalf of the little man who cannot afford, if he is a pear grower or an apple grower, to buy the equipment to wash and clean his pears or apples himself, but has to cooperate with his neighbors and go down to some shed on the railroad track to process them, which washing pears is called, and pack his fruit and get it off to market.

It is for that reason that I call the attention of my genial colleague from California [Mr. WELCH] to the fact that if the suggested Norton amendment were adopted those packagers would not be exempt. They are not included under agriculture as it is defined under section 3 (f) of this bill.

My proposal is one that has already been approved by the House, by the Senate, and by the President himself. If it is incorporated in the bill of the gentlewoman from New Jersey the President can have no reason to veto the bill and the House and Senate can have no reason to reject it, because it is already law in connection with the most important, the most vital part of what affects the farmer, the tax.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEALEY. Are not thousands of people employed in these cooperative plants that are conducted by the farmers?

Mr. BUCK. I would not say that as to any one plant.

Mr. HEALEY. In some instances there are thousands employed in the packing of the fruit and vegetables that are affected by the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BUCK. May I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that there are probably thousands of plants, but I doubt if in any one plant more than 100 or 150 people are employed.

Mr. HEALEY. Modern machinery is installed; there is an assembly line and a conveyor belt and all that sort of thing?

Mr. BUCK. I hope so. I hope they work efficiently. The gentleman asked me the other day how many people would be affected by this amendment.

Mr. HEALEY. Yes.

Mr. BUCK. I inquired into it and I understand about 200,000. I want to give that for his information.

Mr. HEALEY. In other words, 200,000 workers will be taken from under the wage and hour provision of the act if this amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman does not mean to imply that 200,000 workers would be taken out of the act. He means that the small farmers who collectively employ 200,000 workers are discriminated against today, as far as wages and hours are concerned, to the extent of 200,000 employees.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. What is the average hourly rate of pay for these 200,000 workers at the present moment?

Mr. BUCK. As far as I know, it is way above the 30-cent minimum. It certainly is in California, and I am sure it is in Arizona, where the gentleman comes from.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Does the gentleman's amendment draw any distinction between the man who milks the cow and the man who makes the butter?

Mr. BUCK. As long as it is an operation performed in the line of getting the agricultural product to market—and I presume milk and butter are agricultural products—there is no distinction whatever; but I want to warn the gentleman and all the House to this effect: Once it gets to market, I have no interest in what happens then and my amendment does not cover labor engaged in distribution.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Does the gentleman consider a creamery where butter and other dairy products are processed in the market? Does the gentleman consider them commercial institutions?

Mr. BUCK. If they are commercial, they will not be covered by my amendment.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I understand that; but what is the gentleman's idea as to when an institution becomes commercial?

Mr. BUCK. I am sorry; that ought to be discussed at a later date.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. We ought to have that here if we are going to know clearly about the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BARTON of New York. The gentleman's amendment applies to both hours and wages; is that correct?

Mr. BUCK. Let me repeat again, in subsection (6) of paragraph 13 (a) agriculture is exempt from both sections 6 and 7. I am trying to redefine agriculture with the same definition that the House, the Senate, and the President approved a year ago with reference to the Social Security Act. There is nothing new in this at all.

Mr. BARTON of New York. I agree with the gentleman that it would be very desirable if we could have the same definition of agriculture in all our legislation and not have to redefine it every time we pass another act, but would it be acceptable to the gentleman if his amendment could be applied to the committee amendment at a point where it could provide for exemption from the hours only and not from the wages?

Mr. BUCK. I am advised by the Parliamentarian that the proper place to offer my amendment is where I am offering it.

Mr. BARTON of New York. But would it be acceptable to the gentleman, if it were possible to do it, to have the definition apply only to the matter of hours and not of wages?

Mr. BUCK. Would the committee accept the amendment in that event?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. WELCH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, and if I do object it will be the first time since I have been a Member of this body, I feel, however, if my colleague from California is granted an additional 5 minutes' time he should yield for questions.

Mr. BUCK. As I understand, the time has not been limited, but the only reason I am asking the additional 5 minutes is to answer some questions. If the gentleman does not want questions answered, then he can object.

Mr. WELCH. I do not object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. NORTON. The meaning of the word "agriculture" is contained in the act. The gentleman's amendment will certainly broaden it.

Mr. BUCK. May I say to the gentlewoman from New Jersey that the only point where it is broadened, as far as the farmer can see, is by defining as such certain agricultural or horticultural operations that have not been considered to be such by the Wage and Hour Division and the Bureau of Internal Revenue, for instance, maple sugar, about which I have talked with the gentlewoman. It also does one thing which I have emphasized time and again—it gives the small farmer who has to go into a cooperative the same rights I have now, as the proprietor of a farm large enough to maintain its own packing shed. As long as I am a Member of this body I am going to fight for my neighbors as well as myself.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I would like to inquire of the gentleman with respect particularly to the fruit industry as to whether or not the wages that were paid prior to any of the labor legislation, on the average, was a good deal higher than the wages that will be paid under the wage and hour provision.

Mr. BUCK. They not only were taken, but they are now.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBERTSON. If I may have the attention of the Chairman of the Committee, I would like to answer a part of the question she asked. The amendment offered by the gentleman from California reads:

> But only of such services performed as an incident to ordinary farming operations or in the case of fruits and vegetables as an incident to the preparation of such fruits or vegetables for market. The provisions of this paragraph shall not be deemed to be applicable with respect to the service performed in connection with commercial canning or commercial freezing or in connection with any agricultural or horticultural commodity after it is delivered to a terminal market for distribution for consumption.

It is the farming operation that the gentleman seeks to define.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. My interpretation of this amendment is that it broadens the term agriculture, and when it does that, if it is adopted it will have the effect of legalizing child labor in all of these processing operations.

Mr. BUCK. Oh, no——

Mrs. NORTON. Wait a minute. Refer to section 13 (c) of the act. It exempts persons employed in agriculture from the child-labor provisions of the act. Now, when you tinker with interpretations and broaden the definition of agriculture, you also broaden the exemption with respect to the child-labor provisions of the act.

Mr. BUCK. Wait a minute. May I call the attention of the gentlewoman to the fact that no child is going to be engaged in caring for ditches or engaged on irrigation or the felling of trees.

Mrs. NORTON. I will say to the gentleman that we are not going to take any chances of resurrecting child labor in this act.

Mr. BUCK. Certainly not. The gentlewoman has already exempted, in the original bill, child labor as it applies to agriculture, and this is only a clarification of the definition of agriculture.

May I call the gentlewoman's attention to the fact that when she moved on June 5, 1939, to suspend the rules and pass her bill, she put into the resolution a further exemption—and she did not say anything about child labor—that, and I quote:

> Any employee employed in cleaning, packing, grading, or preparing, but not canning or processing, fresh fruits and vegetables in their raw and natural state, when such operations are performed within the generally recognized production section or area where such commodities are produced normally or are usually prepared for market.

And let me say that, so far as fresh fruits are concerned, that is all that my amendment does. There was no objection to broadening a child-labor exemption then.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. The question that is disturbing many Members on the floor is this: After fruits and vegetables, agricultural products, or even meats reach the processing station, even though they are owned by the farmers themselves, are they exempted in the processing of those vegetables?

Mr. BUCK. Not now.

Mr. DONDERO. But they will be under the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. BUCK. They will be.

Mr. DONDERO. And why should they not be?

Mr. BUCK. They will be if they have not reached a terminal market for distribution for consumption, and I do not see why they should be exempt after that.

Mr. DONDERO. But they will be in the course of processing where they are owned by a cooperative association.

Mr. BUCK. If you bring your beans into a central packing house, they will be exempt. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

If the amendment offered by my colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] is adopted, it would remove 200,000 nonagricultural workers from the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. It would deny them 30 cents an hour, $12 a week. They are not farm laborers, they are industrial workers employed in canneries and processing plants, and to remove 200,000 of them from the protection of a law which assures them a meager $12 a week, whether they work in a rural district or in a large city, is not in keeping with the principles of the act itself and not in keeping with the spirit expressed in this House yesterday.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELCH. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I also want to call attention to the fact that because the Ways and Means Committee included this amendment in the Social Security Act last year is no reason why it should be included in this bill. It was with a great deal of hesitancy and in order to give agriculture, as far as we could, a break from a tax angle that we did that, and it was with a great deal of hesitancy that it was put into the bill by men like myself who come from city districts, never realizing that they were going to propose the same thing for this wage and hour bill, and I have heard they are going to propose it also as an amendment to the National Labor Relations Act.

The fact that the Ways and Means Committee included it last year should not be considered as a precedent, so far as this bill is concerned. We erred deliberately on the side of agriculture from the angle of taxes, and not from the angle of exempting from the minimum payment of 30 cents an hour.

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELCH. Yes.

Mr. BEAM. To ask the gentleman from California for the information of the House, whether he can give us about the number of employees who will be affected, who would be taken out from the operation of this act, if this amendment were passed.

Mr. WELCH. The gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] who offered the amendment, admitted that it would eliminate 200,000 workers from the provisions of the law.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman did not say it would take 200,000 laborers from under the provisions of the law. He said that those 200,000 laborers are agricultural laborers, and they are, in his opinion, under a proper construction of the law as it stands today.

Mr. WELCH. If the gentleman's amendment should be adopted, it would remove 200,000 nonagricultural workers from the law, and deny to them the right to have a minimum wage of $12.60 a week.

Mr. BUCK. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not let that statement remain in the RECORD. The gentleman is an able man and he knows better than that. They are agricultural workers, they are doing the same work for the operators as the mothers and sisters are doing for me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY] and of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]. The object of this amendment, as I understand it, is to redefine agriculture so that in the various laws we may have a uniform definition—not a different definition under each law, a different interpretation, one by the Labor Board, one by the Administrator of the wage-hour law, another definition by the Social Security Board when applying that act, and still another by the courts, varying at times as the various acts come before the courts.

I have been greatly interested in what the two gentlemen from Massachusetts have had to say about this 30-cents-an-hour provision. I realize these gentlemen come from industrial districts. I know each is charitable and has no intention of being either unkind or unreasonable, but I have often wondered if either ever lived upon a farm, if either ever realized what some who have been raised on the farm, who must make a living from the farm, have to contend with now, with farming conditions what they are, with prices which for farm products are all too often below the cost of production.

I understand that the Secretary of Labor has now made a ruling in connection with one industry, applying to Government contracts—under the bill which I understand one of these gentlemen from Massachusetts sponsored in the House—that common labor must be paid 90 cents an hour, and, of course, time and a half when longer hours, under this law, require an overtime wage of $1.35 an hour for common labor.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. I have observed about the gentleman that when he discusses any of these labor matters his emotions get the best of him. Of course, in this case he has not the facts, as is usually the case.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Very well. If I am in error, I stand corrected as to the 90 cents an hour, but I call the attention of the gentlemen to a decision of the Supreme Court this week sustaining the ruling of the Secretary of Labor as to 62½ cents an hour as a minimum wage for common labor. If I get emotional it is because I have some real, as distinguished from synthetic, sympathy for some of the folks who are not making 90 cents an hour or 62½ cents an hour or 93 cents or $1.35 an hour for overtime as common laborers. I am thinking of those folks down on the farm who are working for 20 cents an hour when they can get the work.

For example, I wonder if some Members of the Congress know that eggs have to be cleaned before they go to market, and that before they go to market in the cities they must often be candled; that sugar beets and onions must be topped; that celery must be washed and trimmed; that hay and straw must be threshed; that farmers and their sons and daughters do not earn 20 cents an hour for their work while the Secretary of Labor determines that common labor in the factory is paid 90 cents an hour? I wonder if the gentlemen realize that on the farms of this country there are thousands of young men and women, hundreds of thousands of men and women who grow farm products, who must put them on the market, who must sell them if they are to meet the taxes and make a living, and that people in the cities never have paid the price so that the farmer who produces the food on which the city people live, on which they depend for existence, can get as much as 25 cents an hour for his work?

Do not misunderstand. We are not saying that the industrial worker draws too high a wage, but we do say that it is unjust that he should receive 5 or 10 times as much per hour as does the man who tills the soil. Those on the farm dig into the dirt year after year; those on the farm follow the plow and the harrow through the dirt and the dust and in the springtime they stand in the barnyard up almost to their knees in manure, load it on the old farm wagon or the more new-fangled manure spreader, for which the farmer must pay for the labor that went into its production at an hourly rate 5 times that which he receives for his work, and then haul it out to fertilize the fields which must produce the food for the people in the cities. If a workman off the farm gets 62½ cents an hour, what are you willing to pay us for the farm labor? Are you willing to pay a price for the food the farmer grows which you must have if you live, which will insure to him a minimum of 30 cents an hour and, on occasion, 50 or 60 or 90 cents an hour, as is the average in the automobile industry?

Now, why not be a little more charitable? Give to the farmer part of that high wage you are talking about. What do you want us to do? We can grow the crops. Do you want to ask us to pay a price that you know we cannot pay for the labor to prepare that produce for market? Are we to have 30 cents? Oh, you say that is little enough. You say that is too little. We agree. But, unfortunately, it is 30 cents or nothing. All too often we must take the 30 cents, or 25, or 20 cents, or we get nothing for what we do.

The crop is ready for market. The fruit is on the tree; it is ripe; it must be harvested. It must go to market if it is to be sold at all. Do you want us to pay 40 or 50 cents an hour for the labor in picking it, when, after we get it to market, we cannot even receive the price of the baskets in which it is packed?

Perhaps our neighbors, or the sons and the daughters of our neighbors, are not only willing, but they are anxious, to work. They realize the situation. They know that the labor cost cannot be 30 cents per hour if the produce is to be marketed, and so they are willing to work for 20 or 25 cents.

It is all right for the industrial worker to draw his 50 or his 90 cents per hour for common labor, if he needs that much to keep him alive, but why insist that those on the farms must give up even the 25- or 20-cents-per-hour job, which is all they have?

You add to the cost of everything the farmer buys by fixing a comparatively high hourly wage for the industrial worker, and then you deny to the farmer or the farmer's boy the right to work for a neighbor at even 20 cents per hour, if, under the ruling of the Administrator, he can be classed as an industrial worker.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. ENGEL. In reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY], a member of the Construction Quartermaster Corps told me in the War Department Subcommittee on Appropriations that the common labor was fixed by the Secretary of War on a War Department construction project at St. Louis at 50 cents an hour, and 25 miles from St. Louis at 90 cents an hour.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; not now.

Mr. HEALEY. You just want to make statements. You do not want an answer.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, now, that is not a fair statement. You know it is not. I doubt if anyone yields more readily, more often, than do I; and you have noted now from the statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL] that a ruling of a Federal department has been made under which common labor gets 90 cents an hour. I will tell you what I want. Instead of depriving the farmer or his children of an opportunity to make that little 20 cents an hour, of which you speak in such disparaging terms, give us at least the chance to make that small, all too insufficient sum, and pay the farmer for the things he grows a fair and a reasonable price. Take your 50 or your 90 cents per hour, but when you spend it for the bread or the meat you eat, or the fruit which aids you in keeping your health, remember that the farmer who produced it, on an average, was getting less than 25 cents an hour for his work. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] has referred to me, and any reference by the gentleman from Michigan is considered by myself as a compliment, I feel constrained to answer a few of his remarks.

The gentleman speaks about "charity." He particularly referred to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY] and to the gentleman from Massachusetts who is now addressing the Committee. Well, "charity" is a word with a broad meaning. It can have many constructions; but the gentleman applied "charity" in relation to the farmer, and he particularly referred to the two gentlemen from Massachusetts.

I am still groping to try to solve the agricultural problem, as well as many other problems. I come from a district where there is not a farm or a farmer, and yet I spoke for the first Bankhead cotton-quota bill. Whether or not I was right I do not know, but I thought I was trying to help agriculture. I have voted for parity payments. I do not know if I voted right or not, but I voted that way because I thought I was assisting the farmer. I wonder if the gentleman from Michigan voted for parity payments?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman let me answer that?

Mr. McCORMACK. Certainly. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I did not. And I do not intend to vote for the $212,000,000 appropriation which is coming before the House next week. The farmers in my district do not want charity. They do not want a dole. They want justice. They want an opportunity to do as their forefathers did; to be independent, not to be wards of the Government. They have no desire to be serfs, peasants, or slaves. If you will give them an opportunity, they will stand on their own feet.

Mr. McCORMACK. All right. That is an answer.

Mr. HOFFMAN. What the farmer wants is a chance to earn his own living.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes. You want a chance to make a speech. I voted. The RECORD will speak for itself as to who is most charitable. I am not accusing the gentleman from Michigan of being uncharitable because he voted against it, but the question as to who is most charitable as between the gentleman's vote and myself is a matter for somebody else to decide. I think my vote was at least on the charitable side.

I have spoken for appropriations for relief of the farm-tenant problem. I do not know how the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] voted, but the probabilities are he voted against it. We are going to have another vote tomorrow, or in a few days, on that question. From the angle of charity, as far as the farmer is concerned, coming from a district where there is not one farm, I would submit my record to the constituents of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] as against his record, as to which record constitutes most charitable consideration of the farmer. [Applause.]

Now, with reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK], I did not intend to speak on it on this occasion. Having taken the floor to answer the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], I will make some observations on the Buck amendment. Nobody objects to agricultural help being exempted. They are exempt under the law now. What we do object to—does that offend the sensibilities of my friend from California?

Mr. BUCK. Not at all. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. Agriculture, as the gentleman from Massachusetts said, is now exempt. The question is with the rulings that are made. We are trying, as I told the gentleman yesterday, to put a chart up there by which the Administrator can work.

Mr. McCORMACK. Now, what we object to is the extent to which the amendment goes in its practical operation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman describe that extent right now?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; to some extent. I cannot describe it to all the extent. The gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] could not answer what was "commercial activities" when the question was asked by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN].

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman mentioned my name. I want to know what it was I would not answer.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Minnesota asked what constituted "commercial activity," and the gentleman said he would discuss that at a later date.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman knows perfectly well that the provision says it does not apply to commercial canning or commercial freezing.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; but the gentleman was asked what that was and the gentleman said he would discuss it at a later date. The gentleman did not answer it.

One thing is certain; it does cover cooperatives. There are anywhere from 100 to 5,000 members of cooperatives who employ anywhere from two to three hundred help in the processing of farm products. It also covers and exempts from the coverage of the law the employees of large-scale processing activities carried on by large corporations, who, in addition to other corporate activities, own in some cases thousands of acres of farm land. They are just as much engaged in industrial activity as the shoe worker in New York or the textile worker of the South or of the North. In the textiles they fabricate cotton, and cotton is a farm product. They fabricate wool into the finished product, and wool is a farm product. You might as well say that the farmer who has a retail store in Boston, or New York, or any other city, because he is a farmer, and who has a retail outlet, should not be covered by the provisions of the Wage and Hour Act, on his retail activities.

This amendment is going to be later offered to the National Labor Relations Act in an attempt to exclude 200,000 workers from the benefits of collective bargaining.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield for an inquiry only.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to see if we cannot reach some agreement as to time on this amendment. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this amendment close in 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mrs. NORTON) there were—ayes 57, noes 71.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, it is on very rare occasions that I ask for any time, but I really feel, based on my experience since I have been a Member of this body and since the enactment of this so-called wage-hour law, that my colleagues should grant me a few moments of their undivided attention so that I may present my views on the pending bill.

Mr. Chairman, in the first place, when the original proposal for the Wage and Hour Act was brought before this House, I was one of the first signers of the motion to discharge the Committee on Labor from consideration of the proposal in order that it could be acted upon; and I did it under the promise, if you please, that the language "area of production" excluded agricultural labor. But let me say to the membership that never since I have been a Member of the House have I had such an overt act perpetrated to my detriment and to the detriment of agriculture. The Members know from their own sad experience—those honestly and conscientiously interested in the welfare of agriculture—that "area of production" has been interpreted in a way to stretch it far beyond what is comparable to common sense and decent reasoning.

Let me say to you that I believe the present Administrator of the act, Colonel Fleming, is going to do the very best he can under the language provided in a bill by this Congress. Whatever you do, do not embarrass Colonel Fleming by sending the bill back to him containing language so indefinite, so intangible in description as the original phrase "area of production." It does not reflect credit upon the membership of this body, in my opinion, to have had such language incorporated in any bill.

When Colonel Fleming was before the Committee on Appropriations, of which I have the honor of being a member, I asked him in general the following question:

> Colonel, what is one of your outstanding difficulties in administering the Wage and Hour Act?

In the hearings you will find his answer in substantially the following language:

> The definition of "area of production."

I asked:

> What would it do for you if the Congress were to define agriculture?

He said:

> Mr. SHEPPARD, it would be one of the finest things that could be done by the Congress not only in behalf of my own organization but of all organizations that have anything to do with the interpretation of laws applying to agriculture.

[Applause.]

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield for a question.

Mr. GEYER of California. Did he indicate how he wanted to phrase it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; he did not.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the gentleman believe it would help facilitate the administration of these laws if Congress would give to the Wage and Hour Division and other divisions of the Government some definition of what constitutes agricultural labor instead of creating dissension among all the departments and having them fighting every minute of the day trying to decide what does constitute agricultural labor?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Replying to the gentleman from Michigan, I will say "Yes," for the reason that it certainly could not be any worse monstrosity than they are now operating under, and the Buck amendment should be an improvement.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] made the statement when the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] had the floor that the reason the Ways and Means Committee permitted this language defining agriculture to remain in the bill, when it was before the Ways and Means Committee, was because of their sympathy for agriculture and their desire to exclude agriculture from taxation.

May I ask my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], is not this proposal in the Buck amendment to define agriculture as meritorious now as it was when the Ways and Means Committee considered it? I do not say the proposal offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] is going to be a complete answer to the situation or will solve the problem in its entirety, but certainly as a legislative group we should do something to help the situation. I ask the amendment be agreed to.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we have spent several days trying to find out what this wage-hour law was intended to do, what it is doing, what it ought to do, and what it ought not to do. Now, we have got down to the place where we are trying to find out and decide for ourselves what agriculture is. I am not entirely certain I know what it is in its entirety. I am not certain I could give a definition that would cover every activity included under the word "agriculture," but I have read the proposed amendment introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK], and I think it is one of the best-drawn things from a legislative standpoint I have ever encountered. It leaves no doubt whatsoever what is meant, and that is a very, very great virtue, whether we are for it or against it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], upon my asking him if he would describe the extent to which this amendment runs, ended up by intimating it would reach even a woolen mill. Now, I do not mean to use a harsh expression, but that is nonsense, and the gentleman from Massachusetts does not really mean that.

A careful reading of the amendment will show it applies only to those things that are incidental to running a farm and marketing its goods in the raw state. That is all. It does not cover processing, such as canning or freezing these goods, in a commercial undertaking.

If anybody wants to know what a commercial undertaking is, he can look it up in a dictionary. I have the impression that a commercial undertaking is one in which the person who is in it both buys and sells. A canner buys the raw crops, processes them, and then sells the finished product. He is in a commercial undertaking, and this amendment excludes him from the definition of a farmer or an agricultural pursuit.

At the risk of boring you, let me give an illustration of the kind of thing this amendment would cover, and I ask you in all honesty if the illustration is not justified under the circumstances. In the part of the country where I live we raise more beans, next to the State of Michigan, than any other part of the country. We will call them Boston-baked beans so you city people will understand what I mean by the term "beans." There are several varieties, but they are all treated in the same way. We harvest them, then we put them through a threshing machine. That is a farm operation, I hope you will all agree. But when the beans come out of the threshing machine they are not fit for market. They have to be cleaned, or, as we call it, "picked." No farmer can afford to maintain for himself a bean picking or cleaning plant. So, little plants have been established all around the country. We take our beans to that plant and have them picked for us. We pay the cost of the picking. It is part of the operation in preparing the beans for market. Without the threshing machine they cannot go to the market and without the picking machine they cannot go to market and we pay for both the threshing and the picking. Our contention is that the picking of those beans is a necessary incident to raising and marketing the beans. This amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] would exempt that little plant where the beans are picked. We are charged by the pound. For years prior to the enactment of the Wage and Hour Act and the extension of it by definition to the bean-picking plant, I paid 5 cents a pound to have them picked. As soon as the act went into effect I had to pay 7 cents a pound, and no one is the better for it. It caused unemployment rather than increased employment. The cost goes right back on the farmer when he has to pay for these services. And the market price of his product does not go up. You will notice this amendment relates to services incident to the marketing of crops—the raising and marketing of crops. The definition is an accurate one, it is a reasonable one, and you cannot divorce this service from agriculture. Without it there is no agriculture.

When I sell wheat I have to have it cleaned. When I sell oats I have it cleaned, else it cannot be sold. Those grains are not marketable otherwise. Is that not a part of agriculture? The exemption does not follow the wheat to the flour mill. There the wheat is processed into flour and the flour is sold for commercial purposes. The amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] absolutely excludes that operation. I wish the people here who are such friends of labor would understand something about our difficulties. The Buck amendment will not hurt labor one little bit. Labor cannot be hurt by it. It relieves from a menace of the present law the men and women who raise the food of this Nation.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I tried to obtain time as soon as possible after the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan who addressed his remarks to me particularly and to my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK]. As I stated to him in the brief colloquy he permitted me to have with him, I observe that when matters affecting labor are under discussion on this floor the gentleman seems to lose all control of his emotions. Every fiber of his being seems to be aquiver. When a man is so emotionally moved as the gentleman from Michigan has so often evidenced here on the floor, he naturally omits many of the very pertinent and relevant facts from a discussion.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEALEY. Not just at this moment.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Then I make the point of order, if the gentleman wants——

Mr. HEALEY. If the gentleman wants to make a point of order, all right.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That the gentleman is indulging in personalities; and now I withdraw it, because I do not care anything about it.

Mr. HEALEY. I think the gentleman indulged in personalities when he referred to me.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEALEY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Was not the gentleman's action emotional then?

Mr. HEALEY. I think it was.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I will make another point of order, that the gentleman from Massachusetts is indulging in personalities and violating the rules.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman want the words taken down?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; I do not.

Mr. McCORMACK. Why does not the gentleman go through with it and see if it is subject to a point of order?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BULWINKLE. That the gentleman from Michigan should ask the Chairman to recognize him on the point of order, otherwise he is violating the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed in order.

Mr. HEALEY. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] complained about a ruling made by the Secretary of Labor under the Healey-Walsh Act. The Supreme Court has just sustained the Secretary of Labor, and as a lawyer and as a Member of the House of Representatives, I am satisfied to accept the decision of the Supreme Court, as I believe most of the other Members of the House are.

During the speech of the gentleman from Michigan another gentleman from Michigan made the statement, after the gentleman yielded to him for the purpose, that the Secretary of Labor had just made a wage determination of 90 cents an hour for certain skilled work.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEALEY. If I do not have it correct, I will yield to find out what it is.

Mr. ENGEL. Common labor; and, if the gentleman will yield further, I believe the place was Beltsville.

Mr. HEALEY. It was in connection with a construction job, was it not?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. I will say to the gentleman that if that wage rate was made by the Secretary of Labor it was made under the provisions of the Bacon-Davis Act, which governs construction work. Of course, that was a Republican measure, sponsored by Republicans—a former distinguished Republican Member of the House and one of the Senate—for the purpose of protecting the labor standards in the building trades.

Of course, all of the remarks of the gentleman are irrelevant to the subject under consideration. My colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] answered the statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] that he was unsympathetic with the farmer. In that same connection I want to say that I believe my record here on votes affecting the farmers of this country speaks eloquently of my sympathy with the welfare of the farmer. I have always endeavored to do what I could on every occasion when any farm legislation was considered here to help the situation of the farmer.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. HEALEY. Not at this moment.

Addressing my remarks now to the particular subject under discussion, let me say that this matter has already been construed by a court. I believe it was the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, in the North Whittier Heights case. This decision concerned the same type of workers in a labor-relations case that are covered by the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK]. The decision in that case, in effect, stated that workers engaged in the advanced stages of processing and preparing for markets agricultural products are in no different situation than any other industrial workers. These persons work in establishments that are essentially industrial in character. There they have the conveyor-belt and the assembly-line technique. In no substantial sense can these workers be considered as having anything to do with farms or the actual process of farming. It is impossible to find any reasonable line of distinction between such workers and persons engaged in work on any other normal factory assembly line. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for the Buck amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANDIS as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. BUCK: After the enacting clause, insert the following:

"SECTION 1. 'Agriculture' includes farming in all its branches and includes all service performed—

"(1) On a farm, in the employ of any person, in connection with cultivating the soil or in connection with raising or harvesting any agricultural or horticultural commodity, including the raising, shearing, feeding, caring for, training, and management of livestock, bees, poultry, and fur-bearing animals and wildlife.

"(2) In the employ of the owner or tenant or other operator of a farm, in connection with the operation, management, conservation, improvement, or maintenance of such farm and its tools and equipment, or in salvaging timber or clearing land of brush and other debris left by a hurricane, if the major part of such service is performed on a farm.

"(3) In connection with the production or harvesting of maple sirup or maple sugar or any commodity defined as an agricultural commodity in section 15 (g) of the Agricultural Marketing Act, as amended, or in connection with the raising or harvesting of mushrooms, or in connection with the hatching of poultry, or in connection with the ginning of cotton, or in connection with the operation or maintenance of ditches, canals, reservoirs, or waterways used exclusively for supplying and storing water for farming purposes.

"As used in this subsection, the term 'farm' includes stock, dairy, poultry, fruit, fur-bearing-animal, and truck farms, plantations, ranches, nurseries, ranges, greenhouses, or other similar structures used primarily for the raising of agricultural or horticultural commodities, and orchards."

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, the first three parts of the definition of agriculture really apply to farming. I want to eliminate the processing and some of the industrial parts of this definition. Thousands of workers engaged in these activities were left out of the Social Security Act. Leaving out subsection (4) will eliminate those that are entitled to come under the Social Security Act.

Subsection (4) reads as follows:

(4) In handling, planting, drying, packing, packaging, processing, freezing, grading, storing, or delivering to storage or to market or to a carrier for transportation to market, any agricultural or horticultural commodity; but only if such service is performed as an incident to ordinary farming operations or, in the case of fruits and vegetables, as an incident to the preparation of such fruits or vegetables for market. The provisions of this paragraph shall not be deemed to be applicable with respect to service performed in connection with commercial canning or commercial freezing or in connection with any agricultural or horticultural commodity after its delivery to a terminal market for distribution for consumption.

This paragraph covers commercial freezing and commercial canning, but it leaves out all those other commercial items of packing houses. I am sure that this House does not want to eliminate the packing houses from the Wages and Hours Act.

I would like you to remember that if those interested in agriculture want an exemption for hours all you have to do is strike out the last two lines of the subsection at the top of page 12.

If you are interested in hours and wages, then you will pass the Buck amendment as it is, and you will include the packing houses and the processing plants and you also have 200,000 employees, who are not farmers, put under the act.

Mr. BUCK. What does the gentleman understand by a packing house?

Mr. LANDIS. This language "immediately off the farm" was intended for a small group of farmers to go out and pack their goods together, but I do not believe that the Congress expected to exempt all the big co-ops in the State of California and all over the Nation.

Mr. BUCK. This is not a California proposition.

Mr. LANDIS. I am talking about co-ops in California and co-ops in other States as well.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman does not misunderstand packing as applying to meat packing, does he?

Mr. LANDIS. When the big packing plants in any State go together and pack and have storages together, they compete with the other storage and packing plants.

Mr. BUCK. I may say to the gentleman that if he will reread the amendment carefully, he will understand that meat-packing plants and packing plants of that kind are not included in my amendment. The amendment applies only to such processing, packaging, and so forth, as is incidental to the normal operation of getting the farm products to the market. Once livestock has reached the corrals of Chicago or Kansas City or Omaha and is bought by what you understand to be packing plants, we are no longer interested. Processing then is an industrial operation and my amendment does not cover that.

Mr. LANDIS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Are you for exempting them from wages and hours?

Mr. BUCK. I am going to say that I am as far as the labor used in preparing fruits, vegetables, and other horticultural or agricultural commodities for market is concerned. For this reason——

Mr. LANDIS. Then there is no use arguing——

Mr. BUCK. Just a minute. After we had the severe financial depression of 1929, 1930, and 1931—this is not partisan at all and I appeal to my Republican friends as well as my Democratic friends—wages on farms dropped down to as low as 15 cents an hour because the farmer could pay no more to produce his crop. I do not see how you are going to fix a wage level on farm products, which are perishable and must be consumed, unless you are going to guarantee him some price for his product that will enable him to pay that wage level, and you are not attempting to do that.

Mr. LANDIS. The farmer, on a farm, as long as he is a farmer, is exempt under the act.

Mr. BUCK. Do you want me to go home, or do you want to go home yourself and tell your small cooperatives that they cannot have the same exemption that you and I can have? If you do, go on home and make your record on that.

Mr. LANDIS. They can have an exemption for fresh fruits and vegetables just by striking out two lines in the section on top of page 12. That is one industry that is in distress, and that is what I am interested in.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS].

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana may be called a delaying amendment. He splits the Buck amendment in two and takes out the heart of it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has made you a very fair and correct analysis of what is involved here. He pointed out that commercial operations are excluded from the Buck amendment. He pointed out that only the work on the farm or for the farmer was included in the Buck amendment, and then he asked you this question: Do you intend to do something to help agriculture, or do you intend to insist upon the principle of a wage rate and an hour rate that gives nobody a job and which will actually result, in the rural sections, in less employment for labor?

We must realistically face the world in which we now live. We are not in the war in Europe, and we do not intend to be in that war, but we are in the economic maelstrom that has resulted from that war. We will continue to be in it as long as the war lasts, and maybe for a long time afterward. The farmer has lost his export market. He cannot hope to sell abroad his surpluses while this war continues. He is a marginal operator. The Buck amendment will wipe out a part of the hardships of the area of production. It follows the definition of the Social Security Act of agriculture and agricultural labor, and may I add that I have made some investigation of the wages in the co-ops on the west coast and in the Midwest where they make some butter and process their milk into cheese in small cooperatives, and the wages for the most part are above the present minimum wage of the Wage and Hour Act; but they cannot afford, when this act takes them to 40 hours next year, to pay time and a half for overtime, and I want to say that if you believe that the economy of this Nation can be supported on a 40-hour week with time and a half for overtime, and a minimum 40-cent wage, applicable to all labor, why do you not put it in the law? Why do you not make the law effective as soon as Congress adjourns? Why do you not go before the Nation on that issue? You know there would not be a corporal's guard reelected to this Congress after such a law had been in effect a few months. We cannot support that economy. You know that when a man is making a dollar and a half or $2 an hour it is folly that he should be paid time and a half for overtime over 40 hours.

You know that the 40-hour week wrecked New Zealand. You know that the 40-hour week wrecked France when the penalty was only 10 percent for overtime, but you insist on this overtime. That is what gets these cooperatives in California. They do not mind the wage, but 40 hours a week, with time-and-a-half overtime for a marginal industry, will crush these small marginal operators. You would intensify unemployment in this Nation. This amendment in all fairness should be adopted, and let no red herring be drawn across the trail about child labor, because child labor is not involved in this amendment any more than it was involved in the bill last year which was agreed to by the committee which said that as far as fresh fruits and vegetables are concerned, they would be exempt from the area-of-production definition. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This matter has been debated for about an hour. The leadership of the House has informed us that they expect to finish this bill tonight. If gentlemen want to stay here and talk all night, it is all right with me, because I can stay as long as anybody else, but I now move that debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and, on a division (demanded by Mr. ENGEL) there were—ayes 97, noes 16.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL] for 3 minutes.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, may I have the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK]. I call the gentleman's attention to the bottom of page 11, subsection (5) which provides for exemption for preparing, cleaning, and so forth, of fresh or dried fruits and vegetables.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Of what bill is the gentleman now speaking?

Mr. ENGEL. I am speaking of the Norton bill, page 12.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Starting at the bottom of page 11?

Mr. ENGEL. Yes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Very well.

Mr. ENGEL. At present there are thousands of little potato warehouses all over the country, some with as few as two employees. Under the area-of-production clause, even under the limited interpretation of the Wage and Hour Division, if these warehouses employ less than seven employees they are exempt. Would a potato stored all winter, ready to be shipped and put into a car in the spring, be considered a fresh or dried vegetable, and come under that clause?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is asking me something that I do not know.

Mr. ENGEL. Under subsection 12 you exempt the handling, grading, cleaning, polishing, hand picking, or storing of whole seeds, beans, peas, or grain, and so forth. Would the gentleman have any objection to inserting the word "potatoes" because surely you do not expect to include potatoes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I would not object to putting the word "potatoes" in there.

Mr. ENGEL. May I ask the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] whether those warehouses would be exempt under his amendment?

Mr. BUCK. I would have to have a little more information about potato warehouses.

Mr. ENGEL. They are privately owned.

Mr. BUCK. If these warehouses were in the same situation as the bean-cleaning warehouses, and so forth, engaged in the preparation of beans for market, they would be exempt under my amendment. I do not know anything about potatoes.

Mr. ENGEL. Might the fact that the charge for preparing them for market is borne by the warehouse owner and not by the farmer have any influence?

Mr. BUCK. Then I think they would not come under my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] has told you that, so far as wages are concerned and so far as hours are concerned, California is above all of these exemptions. Why, then, does he come here and offer this amendment? I will tell you why. You have heard of the Trojan horse and of the camel getting his nose under the tent. I told this House yesterday that this comes from that infamous organization known as the Associated Farmers.

This is nothing more or less than an entering wedge to take out from under the National Labor Relations Act and from this bill some 200,000 workers in the State of California and other places and to place them under sweatshop conditions. They want the definition the same as the Ways and Means Committee has it for taxation purposes. They would like to take out from under the provisions of this act, and particularly the National Labor Relations Board, the right of collective bargaining, so that they can continue with their vigilante activities which they have made notorious, the account of which is all contained in this report from the Civil Liberties Investigating Committee of the Senate. These are the kind of little farmers they are talking about:

American Sugar Crystal Co., which owns and operates 32,493 acres, doing their processing work on this little farm; the American Fruit Growers, Inc., 21,735 acres, which they own and operate and control and carry on all the processing of their products; Cudahy Packing Corporation, 8,535 acres.

This all comes from the Civil Liberties Committee report, from sworn testimony.

I could go on down the line. The Hawaiian Sugar Co., Ltd., 90,000 acres. They want to take all of those people who work for them on those farms from under the benefits of the National Labor Relations Act. I could go on and on and on.

I told you the other day that this Associated Farmers organization is an organization of farmers that farms the farmers. They are an organization of farmers that speaks for railroads. They speak for a great many groups that certainly are not farmers.

This amendment springs from this organization of labor haters. They do not want employees anywhere to organize.

Next week there will be an amendment brought in here to redefine agriculture in the National Labor Relations Act. I am surprised that some of my colleagues from California, who know all about this pickax-handle vigilante group, are supporting this legislation, yet they claim to be friends of labor. Only one of my colleagues has dared to defend this organization. It was he who yesterday refused my unanimous-consent request to continue exposing them.

I see my time is up. I hope you will kill this Buck amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we are using a lot of valuable time in reaching the real crux of this situation.

If I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK], he is simply proposing to redefine agriculture, as it is presently defined in existing law. Is that not true?

Mr. BUCK. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. You are simply redefining "agriculture"? Your amendment in itself exempts nothing. Were it not for the provision in subsection 6 of 13, which exempts agricultural labor, your amendment in itself would exempt nothing; but when we adopt your amendment, which redefines agriculture, it then must be related back to the exemption which is found in subsection 6 of 213 of the code, which exempts any employee employed in agriculture. That exemption will be any employee employed in agriculture as defined in your amendment. That is right, is it not?

Mr. BUCK. If the gentleman will permit me to answer, I think the gentleman is quite correct in that statement. However, I realize what the gentleman's interest is in connection with certain canning operations.

Mr. KEEFE. Now the gentleman has answered my question, let me state further what I am interested in.

Mr. BUCK. Now wait a minute.

Mr. KEEFE. I do not yield further. You have answered my question. Even though your definition of agriculture is accepted—and I want to say to the gentleman that I am going to vote for it, despite what I stated the other day—if your definition of agriculture is accepted, we still will have to provide for the exemptions for canning plants and processing plants, as is provided for in the Norton amendment.

Mr. BUCK. I told the gentleman that the other day.

Mr. KEEFE. I am not asking the gentleman for that further advice. That is a fact, is it not?

Mr. BUCK. Oh, I never attempt to advise my colleagues.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, that is the fact, is it not?

Mr. BUCK. Certainly.

Mr. KEEFE. I am going to support the amendment because I cannot see that it does any harm at all; and if this definition of agriculture is broader than some of the people think, then the definition can be restricted in the further provisions of the act as they may be adopted later on.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does not the gentleman think the Buck amendment will really do some good?

Mr. KEEFE. I think it will do some good as it is presently put into the law, where you propose to place it by your amendment today, by redefining the definition of "agriculture," which is found in subsection (f) of section 6 of the present law.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. At this time the Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS F. FORD] for 3 minutes.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, yesterday, in the course of reading the Barden bill for amendments, the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] offered an amendment, the purport of which was to bar the import of all goods to the United States unless these goods were manufactured under wage and hour conditions exactly conforming to the Fair Labor Standards Act now in force in the United States.

In view of the fact that such a requirement in a measure, designed exclusively to govern conditions in the United States, the colorful and distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin knows that the amendment, while technically germane to the bill under discussion, was utterly impossible of enforcement. Impossible from the practical standpoint for the obvious reason that it would require the services of an army of investigators even if, by some chance, the foreign nations affected would permit the investigation or volunteer the information.

Impractical and impolitic for the further reason that in order to enforce it effectively, an embargo would have to be declared against the nations whose goods would be most directly affected.

If this method were resorted to, to carry out the provisions of the amendment, the Fair Labor Standards Act would have to be further amended empowering or directing the President to declare such an embargo.

The declaration of such an embargo at this time would further aggravate an already delicate international situation to such an extent that it might be tantamount to a declaration of war.

Now the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin loudly proclaims that he and his party—the Republican Party—are determined to keep America out of war, but, much as I dislike saying it, the large vote that the amendment secured came from the peace-loving Republican side of the Chamber.

The plain moral seems to be that the Republicans, in their desperate—and, I am convinced, hopeless—desire to get back into power, are apparently willing to risk embroiling the Nation in all the horrors of war, for the debatable advantage which might result from the opportunity of putting the Democrats on the spot on a silly, trivial, and wholly unenforceable amendment, because a vote against this amendment would enable the orators of the Republican Party to assert that the Democrats voted for oriental labor as against American labor.

No man in the House knows better than the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin how totally impractical and frivolous this amendment was. But he is a shrewd politician, and he hoped to promote the interests of his party, even at the risk of involving the United States in a bloody and devastating war.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SHEPPARD). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] for 5 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I realize what I am about to say will have little serious consideration from the Members of the House. I anticipate it will fall mostly upon deaf ears.

However, I am impelled to speak out at this moment particularly to have the RECORD show that not all the Members of this body are blind to the fact that the most important part of the problem before us is receiving no consideration whatever.

Rivers of oratory have in the last few days been gushing from the Well of the House protesting solicitude, even pity, for the poor, underpaid workers of this country.

The meat of all this eloquent pleading is that we have in our country a group of employers who are not quite human, but regular chiselers who do not scruple to rob their fellow men of the just fruits of their labor; that the victims of this nefarious practice need the protection of this pure and holy Government of ours, which never "takes from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned," not even a kopeck in taxes.

That there are many chiselers in our country no one, of course, questions. What the human race, not only here but elsewhere as well, always has questioned, does now, and always will question, is just how many chiselers there are and who they are.

Christ had some interest in this question. He sought by a simple little democratic process of self-elimination to set up the proper formula by which mankind should always count its stainless souls and sinners. He merely asked us to apply his foremost principle of charity:

> He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her. * * * And they which heard it, being convicted by their own conscience, went out one by one * * * even unto the last: and Jesus was left alone, and the woman standing in the midst.

Suppose we were to apply this simple Christian principle here in this glass-domed temple from whence there is so much pouring out of splenic name calling and judging of others, would the result be any different than it was when it was applied by Christ 2,000 years ago? Of course not, and every man in this Chamber, down deep in his heart, knows this is the truth.

Keeping this fact in mind, we need have no trouble telling just how many real chiselers there are in our country and exactly who they are. The census showing the total population ought to be completed within a short time and available to all of us.

So much for the need of a little soul cleansing on our part as legislators as a better basis for more rational and honest legislation. This, however, is not what I had in mind when I stated at the outset that the most important part of this bill is not being discussed.

Every speech I have heard on this bill in support of fixing wages by law, or, for that matter, every speech I have heard in support of such legislation since I have been a Member of this body, concerned itself with the quantity of money only which should be paid the worker. Not a single word have I ever heard coming from the advocates of this sort of legislation which concerned itself, even in the least, with the quality of the money the worker ought to receive.

Yet there is no question that the quality of money is of far greater importance to labor than the quantity. Nothing is more clear or certain in the evolution of money that this. As the quality of money in which labor is paid has improved, so have the purchasing power and standard of living of the working people improved.

Every great monetary reform that has ever taken place had to do with improving the quality of money, not the quantity. That was true of Queen Elizabeth's reform of the coin of the realm; of the English reform of the standard unit of value connected with its suspension of specie payment from 1797 to 1820; of Austria's reform of its money in the latter part of the nineteenth century following its nearly 100 years of debacle caused by incontrovertible paper currency. Our own great reform of the money as embodied in the Constitution had to do exclusively with its quality. The Revolutionary War itself was perhaps as much the result of poor quality of money as the tyranny of King George. In my opinion the basic achievement of the Constitution makers was the reform of the quality of money, the establishment of a standard unit of intrinsic value, gold and silver.

The reform of our money following the Civil War had to do with its quality. That which took place under the administrations of Cleveland and McKinley had to do exclusively with the quality of money.

Probably in every suspension of specie payment that ever took place, deterioration of the quality of money was the essential cause of the suspension. It is likewise probable that every return to specie payment that has ever taken place was intended to serve and did serve to improve the quality of money.

The great contest between Bryan and McKinley involved the quality of money. In fact it was a struggle between the advocates of quantity money, on the one side, and the advocates of quality money on the other. Quality, as we all know, won out, with the result that from 1896 to 1914 this country achieved one of the greatest periods of prosperity experienced in our history.

Put a floor under wages, that is, fix by law a minimum wage for workers, say the advocates of minimum-wage laws.

But, a floor under wages made of what? Quantity dollars only, or quality dollars also? A floor under wages made of hard money, dependent entirely for its strength and durability upon its own intrinsic value, or one made of irredeemable paper money which has no intrinsic value and whose strength and durability, therefore, are wholly dependent upon the whims and caprice of politicians?

A floor under wages made of gold and silver, whose value or purchasing power is fixed by nature, or one made of wood pulp and rags, whose value or purchasing power is fixed by the self-interest of politicians?

A floor under wages made of gold and silver whose purchasing power has been more stable than any other known or tried substance since these metals have been used for money? Or one of irredeemable paper money, a mere political promise to pay whose purchasing power has been more unstable than any other known or tried substance since it came into use for money?

A floor under wages made of gold and silver which has been the worker's greatest protection to keep and enjoy the fruits of his labor, and the greatest assurance society has had for the most equitable distribution of wealth? Or a floor under wages made of irredeemable paper currency, such as we all are now forced to use, which Daniel Webster properly termed, "The most effectual of inventions to cheat the laboring classes of mankind"?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I am asking the Representatives of the city districts to give us this definition of agricultural labor. I believe it is right. I believe we are not asking anything that is not proper and good for the original act itself. I believe in the wage and hour law, I voted for it, and I think it is mild compared to what I believe will be passed by men sitting in these very seats in years to come.

I can see no solution for the unemployment problem except a cutting down of hours and a regulation of wages. But right now we have some problem to get proper support and backing behind the law. It has been the administration of the act that has caused the trouble. A letter came to my desk today from a farmer near The Dalles, a city of 6,000 people, in an area where they grow large quantities of cherries. Those farmers formed a cooperative organization and built an expensive plant in the city of The Dalles some years ago to take care of their cherries. They are operating cooperatively, and the plant belongs to the farmers. A company dealing in cherries commercially came out from New York and built a plant just outside the city limits. Under the construction of the Wage and Hour Act by those administering it the New York firm does not come under the law, yet the old farmers, just because they happen to have placed their building in the city, do come under it. It is constructions such as this which have brought this law into disrepute.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. Not now.

Mr. Chairman, I am asking that this definition of agricultural labor be given. It will assist in administration of the act. Give us this opportunity to back up the wage and hour law. I want to back up the National Labor Relations Board, too. I do not want either of these laws wiped out or seriously impaired. I do not want anything done to bring them into disrepute. Help us sustain them by giving us this definition. It will create a better attitude toward the act. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. ELLIOTT].

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK]. When I came in the door a minute ago I was very much surprised to see one of our colleagues from California [Mr. GEYER] again attacking the Associated Farmers. The Associated Farmers has not anything to do with the Buck amendment. May I say to the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER]; that I am not a member of the Associated Farmers, but I know many of the small farmers who are members of that organization, and I may say to him that there are no finer people in the San Joaquin Valley, the Tenth Congressional District of California, than the Associated Farmers.

Mr. GEYER of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will not yield. Sit down.

Mr. GEYER of California. I had an idea the gentleman would not yield.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have heard two or three attacks against the Associated Farmers. I can truthfully say to the Members of the House—and this can be proven—that there is no group of people in the State of California who are any more sincere toward people in distressed condition that have come to our State in the last 3 or 4 years than are the members of the farm organizations out there. In one school district in my home county last year, after the farmers paid a school tax of $2.11 in the district they were called upon to pay an additional $1.40 school tax to care for the school children of the migrant people who came there from other States. They also had to pay an increase in the cost of hospitalization, which was placed upon those farmers. I never heard a whimper out of any one of them when I was home last summer or the year before. They want to do everything they can to help the people who are in a distressed condition.

Mr. Chairman, I voted for the wage-hour legislation and I expect to continue to do so. This amendment which the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] offers is a phase that will be of assistance to agriculture, and if any Members of the House have an idea that the farmers are getting rich, it might be well for some of them to invest their money back home in a ranch and try to make a living off of it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAWKS].

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, I am awfully glad that the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER] brought up the question of the Associated Farmers. He might better have stated, and probably more truthfully have stated, that he supports the kind of activities that a certain Mr. Harry Bridges is carrying on in California, wrecking shipping, ruining industry, and adding to the unemployment problem, rather than being in opposition to the Associated Farmers.

Mr. Chairman, the Associated Farmers, as I understand it, and I was in the great State of California last fall, is an organization primarily to combat the kind of thing that Harry Bridges was doing to that grand State, and particularly to the farmers of the State of California.

Mr. GEYER of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWKS. No.

Mr. GEYER of California. The gentleman mentioned my name.

Mr. HAWKS. I am not yielding.

Mr. GEYER of California. He mentioned my name.

Mr. HAWKS. It does not make any difference. The gentleman had his chance at demagoging all day. Now let me speak for a while, for certainly, insofar as this bill is concerned, there has been plenty of demagogy, but very little common sense.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], a few minutes ago, in a very straightforward manner, gave a common-sense explanation of the Buck amendment. Certainly the most rabid supporter of the Wage and Hour Act could see the sense of the gentleman's argument. The operations that are confined to the farm and which are covered by the Buck amendment certainly should have the support even of the chairman of the Labor Committee, who last year made the statement that any amendments to the Wage and Hour Act would be made over her dead body. Well, I guess that will be the truth. I do not see any hope of action in this session of Congress the way this thing has been balled up by the Labor Committee.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the House will support the Buck amendment, and I hope in the future the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER] will profess a more sincere understanding of the Associated Farmers than he has and stop supporting the activities of such aliens as Harry Bridges.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEAVY].

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Buck amendment and, of course, in opposition to the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The definition of agriculture, as found in the Wage and Hour Act, reads now:

(f) "Agriculture" includes farming in all its branches and, among other things, includes the cultivation and tillage of the soil, dairying, the production, cultivation, growing, and harvesting of any agricultural or horticultural commodities (including commodities defined as agricultural commodities in section 15 (g) of the Agricultural Marketing Act, as amended), the raising of livestock, bees, fur-bearing animals, or poultry, and any practices (including any forestry or lumbering operations) performed by a farmer or on a farm as an incident to or in conjunction with such farming operations, including preparation for market, delivery to storage or to market or to carriers for transportation to market.

A little later I shall call your attention to the language of the proposed amendment, and you will see how it clarified a very troublesome and confused situation, and makes possible the continued existence of individual farming, which is now struggling to compete with commercial and corporation farming.

I am sure that no one can question my record for 4 years in this House as a friend of labor. I am one who twice signed the petition to bring the wage and hour bill on the floor. My voting record shows that I have supported wage-hour legislation on all occasions. I am still as heartily in favor of it as I ever was, but the situation that has caused us more trouble than anything else since it has been a law has been the matter of interpretation, definition, and of rulings in attempting to define what is and what is not agriculture. This Congress more than 4 years ago laid down a definition of what constitutes agriculture and placed it in the Social Security Act, and under that act the benefits and the burdens fall on those not engaged in agriculture, and likewise the responsibilities. The definition is as follows:

SEC. 3. (f) "Agriculture" includes farming in all its branches and includes all service performed—

(1) On a farm, in the employ of any person, in connection with cultivating the soil, or in connection with raising or harvesting any agricultural or horticultural commodity, including the raising, shearing, feeding, caring for, training, and management of livestock, bees, poultry, and fur-bearing animals and wildlife.

(2) In the employ of the owner or tenant or other operator of a farm, in connection with the operation, management, conservation, improvement, or maintenance of such farm and its tools and equipment, or in salvaging timber or clearing land of brush and other debris left by a hurricane, if the major part of such service is performed on a farm.

(3) In connection with the production or harvesting of maple sirup or maple sugar or any commodity defined as an agricultural commodity in section 15 (g) of the Agricultural Marketing Act, as amended, or in connection with the raising or harvesting of mushrooms, or in connection with the hatching of poultry, or in connection with the ginning of cotton, or in connection with the operation or maintenance of ditches, canals, reservoirs, or waterways used exclusively for supplying and storing water for farming purposes.

(4) In handling, planting, drying, packing, packaging, processing, freezing, grading, storing, or delivering to storage or to market or to a carrier for transportation to market, any agricultural or horticultural commodity; but only if such service is performed as an incident to ordinary farming operations or, in the case of fruits and vegetables, as an incident to the preparation of such fruits or vegetables for market. The provisions of this paragraph shall not be deemed to be applicable with respect to service performed in connection with commercial canning or commercial freezing or in connection with any agricultural or horticultural commodity after its delivery to a terminal market for distribution for consumption.

As used in this subsection, the term "farm" includes stock, dairy, poultry, fruit, fur-bearing animal, and truck farms, plantations, ranches, nurseries, ranges, greenhouses, or other similar structures used primarily for the raising of agricultural or horticultural commodities, and orchards.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona rose.

Mr. LEAVY. I am sorry, I do not have time to yield.

In 4 years that definition has worked very effectively and satisfactorily. Little fault has been found with it. If it comes to a court for construction, such construction then will be a judicial determination that would aid us in every phase of agriculture where we had the same definition of agriculture in question. I think one definition of agriculture should be accepted, adopted, and run through all legislation affecting agriculture. [Applause.] We have A. A. A. benefits, we have soil-conservation benefits, in a short time we are again going to have up for consideration this matter of parity payments for the farmers, and we have marketing agreements that affect agriculture, and the one definition should apply throughout. The person who is a farmer for the purposes of the Social Security Act should be a farmer for all purposes.

To my friends who are fearful that this will do an injury or a hurt to unorganized labor, let me say that the 200,000 who have been referred to so much are not people who get any benefits from social security. They are not covered into it. In my own district, where apple growing is one of the principal industries, a grower with 500 acres has all of the processing facilities on his ranch and he is exempt entirely from the provisions of the Wage and Hour Act; but 50 growers with 10 acres each cooperate and haul their product to a central place. They are exempt from social-security obligations, but subjected to all of the provisions that you find here. For 20 years we have tried to tell the farmer to become a cooperator, and by the Wage and Hour Act you discriminate against the small operator and make cooperation impossible. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] for 3 minutes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to point out in reference to the Buck amendment that in any definition of agriculture contained in this bill, whoever it exempts from the wage and hour bill also exempts them from the child-labor provisions of the act. It does propose to include in the definition of agriculture some operations which are not now included, such as the canning of fruits and vegetables.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman is making, and I am sure he does not want to make, an inaccurate statement. The amendment specifically states that the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to commercial canning or commercial freezing.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; I understand that, but I reiterate my statement that it does exempt the canning of fruits and vegetables. What is commercial canning? Can anybody tell me that?

Mr. BUCK. Commercial canning is canning for profit off the farm. The canning on the farm is presently exempted, I may tell the gentleman.

Mr. RAMSPECK. There is no such definition as that in this act. I simply want the Committee to know on what they are voting. If they vote for this amendment, they are voting to extend the exemption of child labor as now defined in the definition of agriculture to include various other operations which, in my opinion, are purely commercial operations that are carried on by cooperatives in certain sections of the country and are carried on by commercial canneries or packers in other sections of the country. I personally cannot see any difference between an operation by a cooperative that is organized for profit—and that is what they are—and one carried on by a commercial cannery or packer that is doing exactly the same thing to the same products.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the Committee will reject the amendment. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order, because there was a limitation on the time, and all time has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. This is a motion to strike out the enacting clause. There is no time set on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman should put the motion in writing and send it to the Clerk's desk.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK].

The substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mrs. NORTON) there were—ayes 136, noes 51.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers, Mrs. NORTON and Mr. BUCK.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 149, noes 56.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I usually pride myself on having some intelligence—at least enough to be properly identified as "man" in the animal kingdom. I think I have the power of attention. In the case of the bill or bills before us now, and upon which we shall shortly vote, I confess my mind is not entirely settled and clear as to what we are doing or intend to do. I hope others are not so confused.

We started out with the Barden bill, but before we could find out what that bill was we substituted the Ramspeck bill, for parliamentary purposes only, and for no other purpose. No one attempted to tell us what that bill is or was or has been. We found our time was limited and made a short cut, and, while we should have debated the Barden bill, we have been debating the Norton bill, which the author said was not her bill, so I am not sure whose bill we have been debating. The only author to manfully acknowledge the parentage of his bill was Mr. Barden, but since we have not discussed his bill but other bills, I still do not know whether or not he is to be congratulated or not. He now does not know what is in his bill, because, while we have discussed the Norton bill, we have amended the Barden bill. He is completely exhausted in defending his bill, which we have not debated at all. All admit we are now back where we started, only further back. It looks to me like a 30-yard penalty for holding. [Laughter and applause.]

You see you can clearly understand the Ramspeck bill, because that has not been discussed at all. If you will turn now to page 3, line 10, of the Ramspeck bill, or another bill, if you have lost the Ramspeck bill, you will find in section 13 of the printed bill—not the committee bill or the substitute bill—subtitle 10, classification A to Z, and so forth, you will find that the exemptions allowed the farmers in that section differ from the same page in the other bills, with this difference: In the Ramspeck bill we have stricken out some of the exemptions to the farmers that we now seek to put back in this bill before us—if anyone can tell which bill is before us.

My mind is fully at rest, and my conscience clear on this piece of legislation, and I am prepared to vote—for which bill, for which title or subtitle, which substitute, I do not know. I have come, however, to one very important conclusion; I am going to vote. [Laughter.] Anyway, as to how I vote is my business now, but it may be the farmer's business when the primary election comes around.

As things generally go in Congress, I feel that those of us who have contributed to this debate, and those who were wise enough to keep out, can be justly proud of the contribution they have made to the country in this debate. My only hope is that those who administer the law, and those who must dodge it to keep going, will have their hunger for information satisfied by reading the proceedings of this debate. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHENS: On page 9, before line 10, insert the following new section:

"SEC. 1. Section 3 (m) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended to read as follows:

"'(m) Wage paid to any employee may include a reasonable charge, as determined by the Administrator, for the furnishing to such employee of board, lodging, or other facilities'."

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be an opinion prevalent in the Congress amongst certain Members that an employer is just an inanimate thing, and that it makes no difference whether he has any income or not, he must do certain things.

This little amendment is an attempt to place the employer on an equal basis with other concerns; in other words, it is for the purpose of permitting the employer to make a reasonable charge for such services as the employer may render to the employee. If he maintains a store and sells goods, he cannot do that solely for his own health. He is doing it in part for the benefit of the employee. I know we allow our sentiments sometimes to run away with us. I know that some of us from down South are accused of not being for labor, and it is said that we favor low wages. There never was a more dastardly charge nor a more untruthful charge than that. There is no Representative from the South who believes in low wages for labor or anything of the sort. I believe that labor should receive as high a wage in one section of this country as he receives in any other section of the country [applause]; but, of course, when there are discriminations against the employee in my section of the country, when he is made to pay more than his fair share in freight rates, and when his employer is compelled to pay a higher freight rate than the employer's competitors elsewhere, and the employee is required to take up the differential, I say it is unfair, and I voted for labor in my section when I voted against the wage and hour bill. I voted for the wage earner in the South when I voted against the wage and hour bill, not only because of freight-rate discriminations but because of advantage given to large monopolistic industrialized concerns. That is the way I see it.

Now, I believe in fair treatment of the employer as well as the employee. I know that he has to earn an income before he can pay a wage. We must have jobs before we can earn anything. That is sensible, and that is all that this little amendment attempts to do—to enable him to make a reasonable charge for services and facilities he furnishes the employee, and nothing more. Why should the employer be penalized? If I were an employee, I would want my employer to be successful. I would want him to prosper so I could keep my job and better my condition, and I submit that this amendment should be adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment at the desk.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, can we not come to some agreement as to time? We are going to finish this bill tonight, and I think we will have to have some agreement on time. Would the House be willing to accept an agreement to finish all debate upon the substitute and all amendments thereto by 5 o'clock? I make that request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that all debate on the substitute and all amendments thereto close at 5 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. I request that all pending amendments be read so that we may know what amendments will be up for discussion and then have a better idea of how much debate there should be. I ask unanimous consent that all amendments on the desk be read for the information of the Committee.

Mrs. NORTON. Does the gentleman mean to have them all read now?

Mr. TARVER. I think we ought to be advised what we are going to discuss. Then we will be in a better position to know whether we want to close debate.

Mrs. NORTON. Would not the gentleman be satisfied to have it stated how many amendments there are at the desk? I think we can get a fairly good idea in that way. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to stay here until 12 o'clock tonight if the rest of the House wants to do so, but unquestionably we are going to finish the bill tonight.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. We could not agree to a proposal of that kind and for this reason: We would run into the identical situation that developed yesterday afternoon when we were discussing amendments. Considerable time was given to unimportant amendments, and when the time was all gone, at the last minute, a very vital amendment came in with no opportunity to discuss it. If there is reasonable opportunity for discussion of bona fide amendments, so far as I am concerned I am ready to shorten debate, but I do want time for the discussion of bona fide amendments.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman agree to close debate at 6 o'clock? I modify my request in that respect, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from New Jersey modifies her request that all debate close at 6 o'clock.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I object, and I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the substitute and all amendments thereto close at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. That motion under the agreed reading of this amendment is not in order at this time but should be made to each particular amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The unanimous-consent request granted yesterday provided that the reading of the substitute would be dispensed with, and that it would be read for amendment by sections today under the same terms as was the agreement in respect to the Ramspeck bill. Therefore, except by unanimous consent for the entire substitute the Chair does not think it is in order to move to close debate. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following preferential motion, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. O'TOOLE moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for me to dwell on the need for my motion to be passed. Every man in the House is sufficiently experienced to know that an effort is being made to draft legislation on this floor on a question that is of vital importance to hundreds of thousands of people in this country. It is impossible to draft good legislation the way we are attempting to do it today. It has been tried before in the 150 years' history of this House, and it has failed, and it will fail today. Let reason prevail. Let us send this bill back to the committee. Let the committee study it at greater length and finally come to us with a strong, corrected piece of legislation—a piece of legislation that will not engender the bitterness or feeling shown here today. I do not mean to attack the committee. The committee itself is at variance as to particular points. If they who have studied the bill cannot agree as to its contents, how can we give to the people of this country a good bill when we are trying to make legislation here under the 5-minute rule? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of criticism of the Labor Committee and its members have been taken to task because they do not all agree as to this legislation. In fairness, does anyone on the floor know of any committee that has brought in a major piece of legislation where all the Members were in agreement as to its meaning? The trouble is not so much with the committee itself as it is with the interpretations which have been placed upon previous legislation.

Nor should the committee be criticized because members who have not had the time or who have not taken the time to study the legislation are not able, in a few moments spent on the floor listening to debate, to fully understand it. A patient examination over a reasonable length of time would, I am sure, do much to give a better understanding of what has been offered. We have been here 4 days discussing labor legislation. During 3 of those days there has been earnest and almost continuous debate directed to the legislation itself. If we now send the bill back to committee, is there any assurance that the House itself will have any more enlightenment after the committee has given the legislation another month's consideration? Why not now finish the task which we have begun and dispose of these proposed amendments to the Labor Act, rather than give evidence of our inability to deal with the situation by sending it back to the committee?

If there are so many Members who want to go tonight at 5 o'clock or 5:30, or who have other engagements, why not adjourn at the later hour until tomorrow, then come back and finish the job? We understand that the farm legislation does not come up until Monday. So vote down this motion and continue our discussion of this bill today and tomorrow, and end this debate as far as the House is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'TOOLE], that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. O'TOOLE) there were—ayes 47, noes 95.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MARCANTONIO: On page 9, line 10, strike out all of the language commencing with the word "that" on page 9, line 10, up to and including the period on line 5, page 11.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, my amendment strikes out the provision of the bill which exempts Puerto Rican workers from the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The excuse for the exemption of those workers has been time and time again given us as a desire to prevent the needle industry of Puerto Rico from going out of existence. That excuse is a sham and it is untrue.

First of all, let me dwell on the needle industry a minute and then I shall come back to the real reason for this attempt to exempt Puerto Rican workers from the benefits of this law. As far as the needle industry is concerned in Puerto Rico, I had an opportunity to explain it to the House on last Friday. It is a contract system. There is no such thing as a needle industry in Puerto Rico. It is not owned by anybody in Puerto Rico. It is work which is sent by chiselers from the city of New York down to some contractor in Puerto Rico. That contractor parcels it out to a subcontractor and that subcontractor parcels it out to another subcontractor, and so on down the line. You have conditions whereby excellent embroidered handkerchiefs, for which you pay as much as $12 a dozen in department stores in the city of New York are made by poor women and children who receive only 5 cents a dozen. Now, it has been said that this relieves unemployment; that if these women and children are deprived of this type of coolie existence it will increase unemployment. I disagree with this contention and deplore it.

I say that if we are going to perpetuate an economy which is based on a coolie wage system, then certainly we are neither fair to ourselves nor are we fair to the people in Puerto Rico. We cannot foster an everlasting coolie wage system in Puerto Rico and still consider ourselves an enlightened people. When we remove the protection of this law from these Puerto Rican women and children we are sacrificing them to the avarice of the worst type of labor exploiter. We are not relieving unemployment, a condition which has existed for years prior to the enactment of the wage and hour law, but we are increasing unemployment by making it impossible for Puerto Rican workers to acquire a decent purchasing power to relieve unemployment. Exempt Puerto Rico from the provisions of this law and you increase unemployment, you reinforce the chains of economic bondage for the people of Puerto Rico and you add to the vileness of our imperialism in Puerto Rico.

Furthermore, please bear this in mind: When they tell you that they are up against terrific competition from Japan and China, that again is not true. We have placed Puerto Rico within the tariff walls of the United States, and Puerto Rican products come within that same protection even though this same tariff has been a factor toward the impoverishment of the Puerto Rican people.

Finally, with regard to the needle trade, even if you want to make an adjustment, although I am opposed to any change in the law, you may do so by an amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON], which gives the Administrator discretion to fix the rate of pay on piece work, and most of this needle trade is piece work. Hence, why extend the exemption to all of the Puerto Rican industries? The answer is that the needle-industry argument is used just as a smoke screen to conceal the real question. The question here is sugar. The main industry of Puerto Rico, so-called industry, is sugar. What they are really seeking to do under the guise of a veil of tears over the needle industry is to exempt the Puerto Rican sugar workers from the protection of this law.

Sugar workers in Puerto Rico, through their unions, entered into an agreement with the sugar corporations. A part of the agreement stated that in the event this law was declared unconstitutional or in the event the law was amended or changed the rate of pay which the sugar companies agreed to pay, the rate of pay guaranteed by the Fair Labor Standards Act, would be discontinued, and that the workers would then go back to the old pay. Do you not now see the chicanery behind this exemption?

We have heard a great deal about farmers here today, but the sugar plantation owners of Puerto Rico are not farmers. They are large foreign sugar corporations, Wall Street-owned and Wall Street-controlled. These large foreign sugar corporations own over 70 percent of the total arable sugar lands of Puerto Rico. They can afford to pay 30 cents an hour, but simply do not want to. Let me give you the figures from the Manual of Sugar Companies for 1939, published by Farr & Co., of New York, showing the enormous profits of these most arrogant and pampered babies of our imperialism in Puerto Rico.

Here are 4 sugar companies:

Eastern Sugar Associates; Fajardo Sugar Growers; Central Aguirre Associates; and South Puerto Rico Sugar Co. (Guanica).

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object. This amendment is very important. I do not know who else wants to talk on the amendment or to offer an amendment to it. I understand the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico wishes to speak on the amendment. If time for debate is going to be limited I shall have to object. Otherwise I will not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, we are not dealing with farmers in Puerto Rico who are seeking relief from this law; we are dealing with four large sugar corporations which own over 70 percent of the total arable sugar land of Puerto Rico and which own the economic life of Puerto Rico as well as many of the so-called spokesmen of Puerto Rico. While they have been paying these wages under this agreement, the wages of the Fair Labor Standards Act, from which they are now seeking to get from under by means of this exemption, they have been and are making tremendous profits. Let me give you a picture of their enormous profits.

The Eastern Sugar Associates earned profits in 1938 of $455,091. The Fajardo Sugar Growers earned profits in 1938 of $1,234,631. The Central Aguirre Associates earned profits of $1,973,026; and the South Puerto Rico Sugar Co. earned profits of $1,235,172.

While these four large companies have been paying the wages required under this law from which they are now trying to escape, they have earned $4,897,920—almost $5,000,000—profits in 1 year. The figures for 1939 are not yet available, but all indications point toward bigger profits in 1939 and 1940. By skillful manipulation of propaganda—and the only thing you read about Puerto Rico down here is what the sugar interests hand out—these sugar corporations that have made and are making these huge profits are using the needle industry as a screen behind which they seek to amend this law, so that they may escape from its wage and hour provisions. My colleagues, all the information you have been receiving on Puerto Rico has been the sugar-corporation side of Puerto Rico. I give you the side of the Puerto Rican workers. I am talking about the plight of these workers employed by the sugar corporations, not by the small farmers, but by large Wall Street-owned sugar corporations. The Puerto Rican workers do not want this law amended. Before he died, Alonzo Forres, secretary of the Federation of Labor of Puerto Rico, fought for the retention of this law. The needle-industry chiselers, the sugar barons, and their stooges want this law amended. I know that the overwhelming masses in Puerto Rico want this law retained, because it is the first ray of hope that they have received from the Congress of the United States. Certainly this Congress is not going to take this protection from them, and by amending this law exempt the Puerto Rican workers from the benefits of this law. Certainly we are not going to aid these Wall Street-owned sugar companies that made $5,000,000 profit in 1 year to get from under the agreement which they had with the sugar workers and force the Puerto Rican workers back to the old disgraceful wages. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PAGÁN. Mr. Chairman, I arise to oppose the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO]. Also, if I have the time, I want to answer certain remarks that the gentleman from New York made to the House during the general debate about these labor bills on last Friday similar to those he made today.

I, as Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico, support the amendment concerning Puerto Rico as it appears in the Norton bill as reported last year by the House Committee on Labor.

First, I shall make plain and clear that there is really no controversy at all about the Norton bill as reported by the Committee on Labor insofar as it refers to Puerto Rico. The amendment covering Puerto Rico appears in just the same language in the three bills. Said amendment provides that industrial committees be appointed, with representation of employers, employees, and the administration, to fix the proper and fair scales of wages among the several industries or groups of industries. Said amendment has been supported by all the parties concerned, by industry, by agriculture, as well as by labor, and by the administration in Puerto Rico. Moreover, after long hearings before the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor in Washington, where representatives of industry and labor, as well as of the Government of Puerto Rico, were heard, the present Administrator of the Division has agreed to this amendment as proper, necessary, and convenient to protect labor as well as American industry in Puerto Rico.

The House Committee on Labor, after a thorough study and consideration of the peculiar conditions of Puerto Rico, also reported and recommended the change in the law as provided in the amendment.

I said the American industry, and I mean the American industry just as well as I mean the American labor in Puerto Rico, because Puerto Ricans are American citizens and because the amendment provided in the so-called Norton bill tends to protect the American industry and labor in Puerto Rico against foreign industry and labor which compete with our industry and labor as affected by the wage and hour law as it is in force at present.

The main industry affected in Puerto Rico by the Wage and Hour Act is our needlework and embroidery industry, which may employ about 70,000 of our 400,000 of poverty-stricken and unemployed laborers in Puerto Rico. The needlework and embroidery industry in Puerto Rico is practically our principal nonagricultural industry. This industry does not compete with any other area in continental United States. We compete with foreign countries which pay very low wages, ranging from 3 and 4 cents per hour, under very poor living conditions of labor.

Due to the present Wage and Hour Act, during the first year of its enforcement in Puerto Rico, our shipments of needlework and embroidery dropped from $21,000,000 in 1938 to about $11,000,000 in the following year, or about half, with the resulting decrease in the island income, in wages to laborers, and in purchasing power of my people who buy every year about $100,000,000 of foodstuffs, clothing, and so forth, from the farmers of the South and West and the manufacturers of the North and East in continental United States.

To oppose the amendment as provided in the Norton or the Committee on Labor bill is practically going against American industry and labor, and protecting foreign industry and foreign labor of Japan, of China, of Madeira, and other foreign countries where laborers are under lower standards of living and earn wages amounting to from 3 to 4 cents per hour.

I do not question the sincerity of the remarks and attitude of the gentleman from New York, as I do not question the sincerity of any Member of Congress, but I can state that my colleague from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] has been misled with incorrect, erroneous, and not truthful information. He lives at and represents a district far away from my island, about 1,400 miles away, and does not know the real conditions of Puerto Rico, and he is not in a position to see and feel the conditions of poverty and unemployment in Puerto Rico, where in a small island overcrowded with a population of nearly 2,000,000 inhabitants we have about 400,000 of unemployed laborers.

The gentleman from New York cannot bring before the House a single statement, letter, or telegram from any bona fide labor union or labor leader of Puerto Rico in opposition to the amendment of the Norton or Committee on Labor amendment.

I can state to the House that labor in Puerto Rico supports the amendment as reported by the Committee on Labor of this House. The former Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico, the late Santiago Iglesias, supported last year this same amendment. No one has ever been in Puerto Rico a more authorized spokesman of labor than Santiago Iglesias. He was the pioneer, the father of the labor movement in Puerto Rico, and he fought there a life struggle for labor.

I should tell the gentleman from New York that I can offer official unchallenged facts about conditions in Puerto Rico.

The Governor of Puerto Rico, Mr. Blanton Winship, in a statement he made last year before the Wage and Hour Division, Department of Labor, said as follows:

At its peak in 1936 Puerto Rico's needlework industry had become the second greatest industry in the island in point of shipment to the United States mainland. Its shipments in that year amounted to around $21,000,000. It has declined sharply since that time, due chiefly to the competition of China and Japan, which has been growing up under the protection of the application of the most-favored-nation clause to the trade agreement of 1935 with Switzerland, whereby the tariff on certain types of hand-ornamented handkerchiefs and other needlework products was sharply reduced.

Women of the Orient are said to receive in many cases as little as 5 or 6 cents a day for their work. We cannot compete with them without adequate tariff protection. Very grave injury has resulted to our hand-needlework industry in Puerto Rico. It has already been substantially cut in half in the 2 years since 1936.

With their families these 90,000 women may represent as many as 400,000 to 500,000 mouths to feed. Taking that together with our present unemployment situation, caused largely by the undue restrictions imposed on our sugar quota, and other trade-agreement restrictions on our industries, there may easily be as many as 750,000 or 800,000 people in the island left without means of support.

The gentleman from New York also spoke about very low wages in Puerto Rico, which, as he stated, might be maintained if the law is amended. I answer his remarks about that, reading to the House a statement made in a public document by the well-known Brookings Institution of Washington, after making a thorough and unbiased survey of the needlework industry in Puerto Rico, which is as follows:

At rates prevailing in Puerto Rico, however, girls who give the same assiduous attention to their tasks that is given by operatives in our eastern cities earn from $9 to $12 a week on sewing machines and up to $17 a week in more highly skilled occupations.

Before closing my remarks I want to recall to the House part of the report made by the House Committee on Labor last year, after hearing and thorough study of conditions of labor in Puerto Rico, which reads as follows:

The minimum-wage and maximum-hour standards of the Fair Labor Standards Act apply to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands in the same manner as they apply to the United States. Sections 1 and 2 of the committee amendment provide a special procedure for fixing minimum wages for the industries of such islands. These sections authorize the Administrator to appoint a special industry committee or committees to recommend minimum-wage rates for employees in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands who are engaged in interstate commerce or in producing goods for interstate commerce. The industry committee or committees are to be composed of residents of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and the United States outside of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands and to include representatives of the public, employers, and employees.

The Administrator and the special committee or committees, when fixing wage rates for employees in the islands, are subject to the standards of section 8 with respect to the fixing of wage rates for employees in the United States. The minimum-wage rate or rates to be fixed, if economic factors require it, may be less than the statutory minima prescribed by section 6 of the act. But to fully protect the competitive position of industries in continental United States, the amendment provides that such committee or committees shall not recommend, nor shall the Administrator approve, wage rates which will give to industries of the islands a competitive advantage over industries of the United States outside of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

When a wage order is issued by the Administrator on the recommendation of such special industry committee or committees, it will have the effect of superseding the rates fixed in the statute for any employee of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands who is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce so long as and insofar as such employee is covered by the wage order. All wage orders issued pursuant to the recommendations of such special committee or committees are subject to review in a United States circuit court of appeals by any aggrieved person for the purpose of determining whether the rates fixed by the wage orders are in accordance with law and are supported by substantial evidence.

Hereafter no industry committee except a special industry committee, as provided in the amendment, will have the power to recommend minimum-wage rates for the employees of such islands. No wage order issued by the Administrator prior to the enactment of the bill is to be, after such enactment, applicable to any employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands.

Industries in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands now operate under many economic disadvantages not common in the United States. Per unit costs of production aside from labor tend to be high because of lack of raw materials essential to manufacturing industries, management difficulties, and the great expense of plant construction and mechanization due to distance from centers of equipment production. Conclusive evidence that such economic disadvantages do exist in these islands is found in the fact that their wage rates, which are substantially lower than those in the United States, do not attract industries from the United States to any appreciable extent. It is believed that the application to the islands of the inflexible minimum-wage rates prescribed by the act will cause serious dislocation in some insular industries and curtail employment opportunities. The object of this amendment is to fix wage rates for these islands which are high enough to discourage migration of business from the United States but which are low enough to encourage industrial development and to provide employment opportunities in the islands.

I want to recall to the House that the Senate of the United States has already approved by unanimous vote this amendment, through a bill of Senator KING.

For these reasons, and speaking on behalf of labor and as Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico, not from New York or any other area of continental United States, nor from any foreign country, I support the amendment recommended last year by the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] and the Committee on Labor, feeling myself confident that that is for the sake and good of industry and labor in Puerto Rico, where our thousands of unemployed people prefer to earn a living by working instead of depending on charity or relief paid from the chest of taxpayers of the United States.

I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from New York is turned down. [Applause.]

Mr. FRIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGÁN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FRIES. Are the sugar industries opposed to paying $12 a week?

Mr. PAGÁN. That is a question for the industry. I have the official statistics of Puerto Rico with me, and all data pertaining to it. I should explain——

Mr. FRIES. I am asking the gentleman if they are opposed to paying that wage.

Mr. PAGÁN. I repeat that is a question for the industry. Let the gentleman proceed——

Mr. FRIES. Why should they not come under this law, then?

Mr. PAGÁN. So far as the agricultural side of sugar is concerned, it is not covered by the present law.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it becomes increasingly obvious that the reason this debate has not proceeded as rapidly as is the custom in this House is because one Member talks about 30 cents an hour and $12 a week, but he is not talking about the same thing that a Member from somewhere else in the country is talking when he speaks about 30 cents an hour and $12 a week. In other words, in considering this bill we fail to distinguish between what is the nominal money wage and what is the effective wage due to the difference in cost of living in various communities. The necessity of so distinguishing has been well shown in our experience with the W. P. A. You who have had experience in this welfare work know how their relief budgets are made up. They include heat, rent, food, and other necessaries. But they have discovered that the cost of the same necessaries will vary in different neighborhoods of a single county, and the discrepancy is very much wider over the whole country. Those of us who went down last year to hearings held by a committee of the Wage and Hour Division on proposed raises in the minimum wage in the shoe industry saw an illustration of what is happening. People from the rural districts fought against a raise in the minimum wage because their people were living comfortably on the present wage and an increase in the minimum wage rate would mean that the rural factories would close and the people would lose their jobs; whereas, on the other hand, Members from the metropolitan sections, particularly in the East, fought for the raise in wage because the existing wage was insufficient to protect their workers against sweatshop labor. They were both right.

I think the statesmen of the future, perhaps the near future, will come in here and amend the law maybe so as to zone every neighborhood in the United States so that each neighborhood may have a wage which will prevent sweatshop conditions. Such a wage in one community might be as low as one-tenth in one part of the country what it should be in some of the larger metropolitan sections.

The fundamental weakness of this law, in my opinion, is such that it tends inevitably to drive the people toward big cities, creating increasing misery and causing larger amounts of money for welfare work to be paid by the Government, increasing by billions of dollars the appropriations necessary for slum clearance, and so forth. I hope that the statesman of tomorrow will see that every law that goes on the statute books should have the reverse effect. The purpose of our legislation should be to encourage the people out of the highly populated sections toward the rural districts and more pleasant parts of the country, where they may have the advantages of free air and sunshine and food from their own gardens and other advantages.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I yield to the distinguished gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. NORTON. All agricultural labor is exempt from this bill. That has been said so many times it is unnecessary to repeat. Is the gentlewoman objecting to paying workers in the United States 30 cents an hour for their labor?

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I am endeavoring to point something out to the distinguished gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. NORTON. I want a "Yes" or "No" answer.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I must answer in my own way. I do not yield further.

Mrs. NORTON. I want to know whether the lady is in favor of reducing the workers of the United States below 30 cents an hour?

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. No; but I am trying to tell you that when you talk about 30 cents an hour you are fighting for a mere pittance that will not deliver your laborers in metropolitan districts from the sweatshops that exist there.

Mrs. NORTON. I would be glad to pay them 60 cents an hour.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, on last Friday the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] was speaking in general debate on the bill now under consideration, and he asserted that 30 cents an hour was the test. He also stated that he could not vote for any bill unless evidence were placed before him that convinced him that a 30-hour exemption is necessary in order for the law to be administered impartially. In the course of those remarks, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] interrogated the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] as follows:

> Is it not a fact that when there is an increase in the price of any farm implement growing out of an increase in wages, that that is passed on to the farmer? What is the difference between a canning factory and a cultivator factory or any other factory?

Then I interjected an interrogation and asked the gentleman from Georgia:

> Is it not a fact that the wages paid by the International Harvester Co. and these other manufacturers of farm machinery have nothing to do with the price of the machinery?

At that time the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] interceded as follows:

> Did I understand the gentleman to say that the cost of producing a thing has not anything in the world to do with the sales price of that article?

I replied to the gentleman from Michigan as follows:

> What I meant to convey is that the wage cost in the production of a thresher or a binder used on a farm is a very small part of the cost of that machine to the farmer. It is not 1 percent, nor one-half of 1 percent.

Mr. Chairman, we were talking about the percentage of increased wages. The gentleman from Michigan tried to convey a misinterpretation to the House of my remarks. What we were all talking about was the percentage increase in wages. The gentleman knows as well as I do that during the war and the post-war days, when farmers were receiving $23 and $24 a hundred pounds for livestock, when we were paying 60 and 70 cents a dozen for eggs, and nearly all farm commodities were selling at similarly high prices, the International Harvester Co. raised the price of their machinery. Since that time many inventions have been applied. They have increased gradually the man-hour production by applied science.

They have not increased the wages appreciably since the post-war days, and during the depression from 1929 to this very day they have not reduced the price of their farm machinery, although wages and farm prices went down to the bottom from 1930 to 1933. I say that the wages paid in the auto industry, for instance, have nothing in the world to do with the price of a car as between 25 years ago and today. When Henry Ford raised his minimum wage to $5 a day, he dropped the price of his car to $430. When he raised the general minimum wage to $6 a day, he was manufacturing cars cheaper than any other auto firm in the country. So it is today that, despite the increase in wages, the automobile industry by the use of mechanization is producing automobiles far more cheaply than in the days when a model T Ford sold for $430.

May I say to those gentlemen who come from the States of King Cotton, and who are most vociferous in opposition to the Wage and Hour Act, that their main crop is not governed by the wage the cotton pickers or what the ginners get; it is governed by a world market. So it is with wheat and many other commodities.

I notice the gentleman from Michigan just voted for the Buck amendment. I want him to go back to his district and tell his people that he was so friendly to labor that he voted for the passage of the Buck amendment, which takes from under this law 200,000 or 300,000 industrial workers, and also takes those industries from under the child-labor provisions of this law. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have been enjoying the debate the past 3 days. If the Members of the House have to put up as much of an argument to get into heaven as they have in the past 3 days in trying to pass labor legislation, I doubt whether many Members will arrive there.

I maintain that 30 cents an hour is an insufficient wage to properly maintain any man or woman in this country, in Puerto Rico, or in any other place in the world. Thirty cents an hour last year would go further than 30 cents an hour this year, because the price of the necessary commodities of life have increased 15, 20, or 25 percent. I hope the time is not far distant when we will have the 5-day, 30-hour week and that no laboring man or woman will receive anything less than 75 cents or a dollar an hour. Our Government can afford to pay such wages. There is a great abundance of everything in this country that is necessary to promote the welfare of mankind. When we want hundreds of thousands of dollars or millions of dollars for battleships and other instruments to destroy life we get it very easily, but it is a difficult task to have legislation passed for the welfare of our people.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The argument throughout this debate has been at all times, as far as the States were concerned, that under these particular conditions this particular industry or this particular set of people cannot pay the 30 cents an hour. The committee in return has been insisting on the payment of that 30 cents an hour every place in the States. What I cannot understand is, What is the peculiar reason for the committee and its chairman in refusing to insist on 30 cents an hour for Puerto Rican workers, and what is the peculiar reason why the majority of this committee and its chairman favor sugar corporations in Puerto Rico in their attempt to get out from under the contract by which they are paying the wages which are guaranteed by the Fair Labor Standards Act? What peculiar conditions can there be, when a corporation can pay and has agreed to pay, to justify this exemption which will permit the sugar corporations to escape their responsibility to pay 30 cents an hour?

Mr. DUNN. I wholeheartedly agree with the gentleman and I maintain that if a corporation cannot pay its employees at least 30 cents an hour it has no right to be in business.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. These sugar corporations are making close to $5,000,000 a year even though they pay the rate guaranteed by the Fair Labor Standards Act now. They want to get from under their contract. If this Norton bill is adopted and if we do not adopt my amendment, we are going to permit these four large sugar corporations to get out from under their contract and go back to the old wages. Why this exception from the general rule of 30 cents an hour? Why discriminate against Puerto Rican workers?

Mr. DUNN. I hope the gentleman's amendment is adopted to prevent that terrible condition from prevailing.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DUNN), there were—ayes 26, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHENS: On page 10, after line 19, insert the following new section:

"SEC. —. Section 6 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by inserting, after the word 'wages', in the third line of subsection (a) thereof, the following: 'in cash or in the form of deductions for money due to an employer from an employee.'"

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply enables an employer, in case his employee owes him some money, to deduct that sum, or part of it, from the pay the employee receives from the employer for wages. At present if the employee owes the employer, the employer, under the ruling of the Administrator, is not permitted to deduct anything for what the employee owes him. As I said a while ago, I believe in treating everybody right. I believe in treating the employee right and I believe in treating the employer right. He is entitled to a little protection as we go along. I regret the necessity of having to introduce an amendment to cure a matter of this kind. It is so difficult to work out injustices administratively. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. KITCHENS].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other amendment to section 1? If not, we will pass to section 2.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARTON of New York: On page 10, line 20, after "Sec. 2.", insert "(a)", and on page 11, after line 5, insert the following:

"(b) Section 6 (a) of such act is amended by adding paragraph 5 at the end thereof, to read as follows:

"'(5) If such employee is a home worker in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, not less than the minimum piece rate prescribed by regulation or order; or, if no such minimum piece rate is in effect, any piece rate adopted by such employer which shall yield, to the proportion or class of employees prescribed by regulation or order, not less than the applicable minimum hourly wage rate. Such minimum piece rates or employer piece rates shall be commensurate with, and shall be paid in lieu of, the minimum hourly wage rate applicable under the provisions of this section. The Administrator, or his authorized representative, shall have power to make such regulations or orders as are necessary or appropriate to carry out any of the provisions of this paragraph, including the power without limiting the generality of the foregoing, to define any operation or occupation which is performed by such home-work employees in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands; to establish minimum piece rates for any operation or occupation so defined; to prescribe the method and procedure for ascertaining and promulgating minimum piece rates and to prescribe standards for employer piece rates, the proportion or class of employees who shall receive not less than the minimum hourly wage rate; and to define the term "home worker."'"

Mr. BARTON of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is the same amendment the committee adopted without a dissenting vote on Monday. The effect of it is simply to give to the Administrator the power to fix piece rates in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands on a basis commensurate with the hourly rates established by the industry committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUDLOW: After line 5, page 11, insert a new section as follows:

"Sec. 3. Section 7 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended in paragraph 2 by striking out the words 'two thousand' and substituting the words 'two thousand and eighty'."

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BARTON of New York. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield I would like to say that so far as this side of the committee is concerned, there is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. LUDLOW. I am pleased to hear the gentleman state that, and I would like to ask the gentlewoman from New Jersey if she has any objection to the amendment.

Mrs. NORTON. No.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what the amendment is before we vote on it.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, under the Fair Labor Standards Act, as it will be in full force and effect on October 24 next, an employee may work 2,080 hours a year if he has no guaranty as to regularity and continuity of his employment.

But, if he and his employer see fit to enter into an annual voluntary continuous wage agreement, which is to the mutual advantage of both, and to the advantage of society in general, he can work only 2,000 hours a year.

This, to my mind, is clearly an error in the original enactment, an error that operates against public policy, and my amendment would correct it.

The sole and only purpose of my amendment is to put the employee who seeks a continuous annual-wage agreement on par as to annual hours of service with the employee who has no such agreement and who may quit his work or lose his job at any time. If my amendment is adopted the employee who has no voluntary annual-wage agreement with his employer and the employee who has such an agreement will be allowed to work exactly the same number of hours a year, namely, 2,080 hours or 40 hours a week for 52 weeks.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman means it just increases the number of hours?

Mr. LUDLOW. Eighty hours.

The amendment I offer would not in any way weaken or cripple the wage and hour law, but would strengthen and improve it by ironing out what appears to be a very clear and obvious discrimination.

Certainly these constant wage and employment agreements are in the interest of the employee as well as the employer, and certainly they are in the general public interest because they contribute to the stability of society and the general feeling of security and contentment that is so much to be longed for, especially in this time of social unrest and economic insecurity.

That being the case, why penalize the employee who desires to enter into a voluntary constant wage and employment agreement? Why reduce his annual income—for that is what it amounts to—below the possible income of his fellow worker who has no assurance as to constancy of employment?

Is it not in the interest of society to encourage these constant wage and employment agreements and to make the differential, if there is to be a differential, not as it now is in favor of the haphazard employee but of the employee who has the foresight and constancy to enter into a continuous-employment agreement? Surely it is. My amendment does not even go so far as to provide a differential. It treats both exactly alike.

The amendment I offer would merely substitute the figures "2,080" in section 7 (b), paragraph 11, subparagraph 2, of the Fair Labor Standards Act in place of the figures "2,000", so that the employee, under these voluntary constant-wage agreements "shall not be employed more than 2,080 hours during any period of 52 consecutive weeks." This amendment would perfect and strengthen the Fair Labor Standards Act and would operate to the general stability of the industrial situation and the benefit of society. It would give the faithful employee an incentive by enabling him to earn a little more annually as a reward for his constancy.

I am advised by those who are in a position to know that the amendment I offer would go a long way toward improving the industrial situation of the country. It has been estimated that if the act were amended as suggested in a reasonable time several million employees in the United States would be working under annual constant wage and employment agreements that would guarantee constant employment and wages for at least a period of 52 consecutive weeks. Would not every employee rather be assured of continuous employment and a definite income over a period of 52 weeks than go on from day to day or week to week not knowing what he or she may earn? It surely is in the interest of the American people to encourage both employers and employees to enter into constant wage and employment agreements. The law as it now stands sounds the death knell of such agreements.

I submit that this proposed amendment should commend itself to all friends of the Fair Labor Standards Act; and I ask the lady from New Jersey whether she has any objection to my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LUDLOW) there were—ayes 53, noes 8.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHENS: On page 11, after line 5, insert the following new section:

"SEC. —. Section 7 (b) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by adding at the end of subsection (3) thereof the following: "or (4) for any period of 4 consecutive workweeks the average length of which is not in excess of that specified in subsection (a)."

Mr. KITCHENS. This amendment, Mr. Chairman, is in line with the amendment you have just adopted, except it does not increase anything, but enables the employee and the employer not to lose so much time or so much earnings from break-downs or shut-downs because of weather conditions, interruption of supplies, or other conditions not infrequently encountered in the lumber industry. These interruptions cause employees to lose time and earnings on a weekly basis under the present wage and hour law. If shut-downs occur toward the end of the week the employee has no opportunity to make up the time or the earnings he has lost. It would seem only fair to correct this situation, which largely is under the control of neither the employer nor the employee. This would give the employee an opportunity, which most of them evidently want, through averaging of hours, to average a full week's pay for every week; in other words, give him the benefit of the time he has lost. Of course, very few of you gentlemen, I suppose, ever worked at a sawmill. I have worked at a sawmill for 35 cents a day and boarded myself or was boarded by my father, and I know that out in the country and all over this country you will find these little sawmills, and even some quite large ones, and people working and living out there, and they can only work sometimes 3 or 4 days a week on account of shut-downs. They close down for one cause, purpose, or another, not the employee's fault, and in order to prevent the employee from losing his time and wages, his earnings being limited, and his weekly hours being limited by law, I have offered this amendment, and I think it is a good one.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other amendment to section 2? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Amendments are open now to section 3.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina: Page 11, line 6, strike out section 3 and insert the following:

"SEC. 3. Section 7 (c) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended to read as follows:

"'(c) No employer shall be deemed to have violated subsection (a) by employing any employee for a workweek in excess of that specified in such subsection without paying the compensation for overtime employment prescribed therein if such employee is so employed in connection with or incidental to—

"'(1) the grading or storage of grain at terminal markets or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations; or

"'(2) the wholesale distribution of perishable or seasonal fresh fruits and vegetables, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations; or

"'(3) the storage at terminal markets of any seasonal or perishable agricultural or horticultural commodity, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations; or

"'(4) the felling of trees, logging or operations incidental to the felling of trees or logging performed prior to delivery, and the delivery, of the logs to a mill for sawing, making pulp, or other processing;

And if such employee receives compensation for employment in excess of 56 hours in any workweek at a rate not less than one and one-half times the regular rate at which he is employed. In the case of an employer engaged in any of the operations specified in paragraphs (1) to (4), inclusive, of this subsection, neither the provisions of subsection (a) nor the limitation of 56 hours in any workweek, during a period or periods of not more than 14 workweeks in the aggregate in any calendar year shall apply to his employees in any place of employment where he is so engaged. In the case of an employer engaged in the grading, loading, slaughtering, or dressing of livestock, or preparing products therefrom at the packing plant, or in handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations, and in the case of an employer not exempted under the provisions of section 13 (a) engaged in the canning, processing, or preserving of any perishable or seasonal fruits or vegetables, including dried fruits, or in handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations, the provisions of subsection (a), during a period or periods of not more than 14 workweeks in the aggregate in any calendar year, shall not apply to his employees in any place of employment where he is so engaged. As used in this subsection, "terminal market" in the case of any agricultural or horticultural commodity means any urban center of more than 150,000 population (according to the last decennial census) where such agricultural or horticultural commodity is customarily stored before processing, or, where such commodity is customarily stored and the greater part thereof distributed to consumers within or adjacent to such urban centers.'"

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, that is the exact section relating to hours which is contained in H. R. 7133, the bill under consideration yesterday, with the exception that I have changed the 16 to 14 weeks. That is the number of weeks provided in the act at the present time and is the same that is carried in the Norton bill. The hours in this section introduced by me at this time relate to 56 instead of 60 hours, as in the Norton bill. It reduces the hours 4 hours a week and the number of weeks the same. There is a difference with reference to the bill under consideration, in that there are certain exemptions allowed in the law as it is now written for the handling of livestock for 14 weeks. That allows for the flood season, the rush season in the livestock business. That exemption is in the present law, as it is now written, but it is not carried in the hours provisions in the present Norton bill. This part of the bill that we considered yesterday as the so-called Barden bill was approved without any amendment, with the exception that I think we struck out a couple of words, and I struck out the word "not," but the terms of this bill are very similar, and take care of all of the situations provided in the law and makes an addition with reference to the timber situation, which my good friend the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMITH] brought to my attention and to the attention of the committee, and it was placed in both bills. The timber addition is in both bills.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. DUNCAN. The definition of a terminal market is any urban center of more than 150,000 people. As I understand it, the employees engaged in the activities defined in paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 at terminal markets of more than 150,000 people, would be relieved of the provisions of the present act, but if they were employed in communities smaller than 150,000 then they would be subject to the provisions of the act as it exists now. Am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I think the gentleman is correct in that.

Mr. DUNCAN. And may I ask further, taking my own city as an example: It is a rather large grain center. It is located 50 miles from Kansas City and 100 miles from Omaha, both of which are likewise grain and packing centers. My town would be subject, so far as hours of labor are concerned, to the provisions of the present act, but Kansas City and Omaha would be relieved of the conditions of the act.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. May I say to the gentleman that I think the other was taken care of in later amendments? What this amendment is designed for is to take care of the flood seasons of that grain situation in those large centers for that short period of time.

Mr. DUNCAN. But there are many smaller cities in this country that are great grain centers, particularly in the Middle West.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. May I say to the gentleman that is one of the tremendous problems we are facing in connection with this bill?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I just wanted to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] a question. Does the gentleman's amendment strike out the entire section 3?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Section 3 of the Norton bill; yes, sir.

Mr. ENGEL. The entire section 7 (c)?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. ENGEL. Now, repeating my statement made a few moments ago, there are in the United States thousands of small potato warehouses, in towns of 150 population. Under "area of production," which of course will be eliminated by this bill, those workers are exempt. Is there anything in this amendment which would exempt those workers from the hours provision of the act?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Not in this division. May I say that under the hours provision they are not exempt now? My district probably produces as many potatoes as any district in the United States.

Mr. ENGEL. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but if they had seven employees or less, I think they were exempt from the act.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Provided they are located within a certain area and provided they did not get any potatoes from more than 10 miles away.

Mr. ENGEL. Why should they not be exempt from this act?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I am in perfect accord with the gentleman.

Mr. ENGEL. Would the gentleman care to amend his amendment?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. I am afraid somebody else might have something to say about that, but what you want is the other exemption.

Mr. ENGEL. May I say this: I have an amendment on the desk to section 3, which will include potatoes with the other products, to which members of the committee on both sides of the aisle agreed. I would like to have the same amendment go on to any amendment which is a substitute.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. If I am thinking of the type of potatoes that the gentleman has in mind—men engaged in processing and preserving of perishable commodities——

Mr. ENGEL. Potatoes are neither fresh nor dried vegetables. That is where the joker comes in.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Under "exemptions," in section 13, paragraph 10, there is an exemption to any individual employed within the area of production as defined by the Administrator engaged in the "handling, packing, storing, ginning, compressing, pasteurizing, drying, and perfecting, in their raw or natural state, or canning of agricultural or horticultural commodities for market." That is the law. Now, it is our hope that we will be able to strike out "area of production" as defined by the Administrator, which will give the gentleman the exemption which he desires.

Mr. ENGEL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. If "area of production" is stricken out there would not be any need for this amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] is an amendment that is sponsored by all the farm organizations in this country. The amendment was acted on yesterday in connection with the entire bill, but due to certain complications that arose in connection with the adoption of so many other amendments, the entire proposal was defeated. The amendment is fair and it will eliminate a great deal of confusion that now exists in the law. For instance, section 7 of the law deals with certain agricultural commodities, including dairy products, sugar, fresh fruits and vegetables, and a half a dozen other different commodities that are also treated in section 13 of the law under the title of "exemptions."

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. Does it also include the poultry industry as it pertains to the packing of eggs and poultry in the small plants over the States?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That is my understanding. It includes those as coming within the purview of "agricultural products," exempt under section 13 of the act.

Mr. JENSEN. But it does not specifically name poultry and eggs?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. No; it does not specifically name poultry and eggs, but it is my understanding that poultry and eggs are agricultural commodities. If I am wrong in that, I certainly want to be corrected, because we do want an exemption for those small poultry plants that are operating in every community in the country.

I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] a question. The committee amendment provides for an exemption as to small poultry plants, and the gentleman's amendment proposes to strike out the committee amendment in that respect. Does the gentleman's amendment take care of giving exemption to these small poultry plants?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. May I say this: Poultry, and so forth, in the law will be taken care of under section 13 (a) (10) if we properly handle that situation when we arrive at it. But that will correct the very thing that one Member referred to, where an employee could work on vegetables and would be exempt, but he would not be exempt if he was working on poultry, and so forth. This amendment is not an exemption from hours and wages, but the principal thing here that is not in the Norton bill is the provision that is now in the law, which takes care of livestock in the flood season.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Then the gentleman's interpretation is that poultry will be taken care of in the general exemption?

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. The gentleman is perfectly familiar with this section. This is exactly that section of the Barden bill with the number of weeks reduced from 16 to 14.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I believe I am familiar with it, but I wanted this colloquy so that the Administrator would know what the intent of Congress was.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. COX. The language of the pending amendment which represents a section taken from the so-called Barden bill was offered largely by Representatives of the farming group; or, in other words, members of the committee sponsoring the amendment to the law in collaboration with the Representatives of the farm group did draw the amendment as it is now represented in the pending amendment?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. COX. But the purpose of the proposal, as I understand it, is to take care of those necessary operations carried on in a delivery of a commodity to the market which must be paid for by the farmer, and also to provide some form of relief for the processors during certain seasons of the year.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman is correct. The amendment should be adopted unanimously to clear up ambiguities that now exist in the law.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish recognition on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to that part of the amendment which defines a terminal market. You will observe that No. 1 under paragraph (c) defines the industry in which labor may be employed to be exempted from the wage provisions of the present act:

The grading or storage of grain at terminal markets—

That is the important part—

the grading or storage of grain at terminal markets, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations; or the wholesale distribution of perishable or seasonal fresh fruits and vegetables, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations.

Under that paragraph the term "terminal markets" is not used.

The next paragraph:

The storage at terminal markets of any seasonal or perishable agricultural or horticultural commodity, or handling or transportation in connection with or incidental to such operations.

Under the terms of this amendment these smaller communities which have elevators for the storage of grain or vegetables will be discriminated against in a competitive way by larger communities through the definition placed upon "terminal markets." That definition is: "Any urban center of more than 150,000 population." There are a great many cities throughout this country that have large grain-storage facilities and facilities for the storage of fruits and vegetables that do not have a population of 150,000.

In my question to the gentleman from North Carolina I mentioned my own city of St. Joseph, Mo. That is one of the large grain centers of the Middle West. It has a population of about 85,000 people. It is 50 miles from Kansas City, where there is likewise a large grain-storage center. North Kansas City, just across the Missouri River in my congressional district, has many large grain elevators. It is a community of approximately 6,000 people; yet that community just across the river from Kansas City would be required to comply with the hours provision of the present Wage and Hour Act, my own city of St. Joseph would be required in the handling of grain to comply with the hours provision—not the wages but the hours provision—of the present Act; whereas Kansas City, a city of 500,000 population, and Omaha, a city of 225,000 population, would not be required to comply with the hours provision of the present act. It seems to me that it is a very distinctly unfair provision and will bring about an unfair competitive situation within the industry, particularly as between the communities in which those storage facilities are located.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. Certainly.

Mr. MAY. Would the result of this amendment, if adopted, be that in the gentleman's city of St. Joseph, they would have to commence operations at an earlier hour or continue them to a later hour than they would in Kansas City or Omaha?

Mr. DUNCAN. Their employees would be subject to the provisions of the existing act. They would have to pay overtime but not in Kansas City and Omaha. The result would be that the handling of grain in the smaller communities—and that exists all over the country because there are many grain elevators in small cities—would be subject to this provision.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. I yield.

Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina. May I say to the gentleman that this amendment was drawn with the communities separated that way because of the nature of the operations. One is an attempt to put one group that was in the market area in the metropolitan area, you might say, and then to give exemption to the other groups, give them a shorter range.

Mr. DUNCAN. But the trouble is that most of these grain centers throughout the Middle West are in the small communities and they are going to be placed at the mercy of these others and will have their markets taken away.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, what I say has no particular reference to the pending amendment. I have not been able to give as much thought and study to this measure as I would like, but in the time I have been permitted to give it study I believe it goes about as far and includes about as much as agriculture can hope to secure favorable action on at this time. What we are interested in is the net result. Of course, this does not go as far as a good many people think it should go. On the other hand, it probably goes further than others think it should. At any rate, it seems to me it is about as much as we can hope to secure in the way of favorable action and final enactment at this session. For that reason it seems to me that the wise thing would be to accept this bill practically as it is presented by the committee without any further material amendment.

It is possible that many good amendments could be attached to the measure, but if the bill is loaded down with amendments, it is likely to be recommitted or is likely to never reach final enactment and approval. So it seems to me that the wise thing, on the part of those who are interested in a fair measure that is presented in the best form that it can be hoped to ultimately secure, would be to vote down all further amendments unless it is some amendment that is necessary to be offered by way of correction.

Mr. HARNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HARNESS. In making that statement, does the gentleman think that we should pass the Norton bill or the committee bill and take away from agricultural processors the exemptions they now enjoy under the rulings of the Administrator?

Mr. JONES of Texas. No. As it is written at the present time, I do not think it will take away the advantages. If some of the amendments that were suggested are adopted, it would take those away. If you will read over in a calm way the stipulations in this bill, you will find that you are in a good deal better position than if you do not have any bill at all, and sometimes a man has to choose between getting a part of something or all of nothing.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman knows that the Administrator and everyone else has had a great deal of difficulty over the definition of area of production.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. All the confusion has risen over that. Does not the gentleman feel we should correct that in order to eliminate the confusion?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I certainly think the confusion over the area-of-production proposition should be corrected; but, as I understand it, the provision we now have under consideration, which deals with hours, plus the stipulation that appears now on page 15 as written in the bill, will pretty well take care of the situation. I am in sympathy with the position which the gentleman takes, but I am very fearful. If we go the full length of the matter the gentleman has in mind, he might find we would get no further than the floor of this House, so far as results are concerned, and I am interested in getting results. There has been a good deal of disappointment so far as some phases of the operation of the act are concerned, and I say that in all good faith.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That is what we are trying to correct.

Mr. GORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Would the gentleman include in his expression the so-called Buck amendment?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I understand the Buck amendment is not in the bill.

Mr. GORE. It has been adopted today.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. NORTON. The Buck amendment was adopted today and I am very much confused over the Buck amendment. My understanding is that that amendment will do exactly what the House voted down yesterday, and I hope will vote down tomorrow.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That has to do with the definition of agriculture?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes. It broadens the definition of agriculture and in my opinion, if adopted, will have the effect of legalizing child labor in all these processing operations. This is so because section 13 (c) of the act exempts persons employed in agriculture from the child-labor provisions of the act. I want to know from the gentleman as chairman of the Agricultural Committee, whom I consider an authority on agricultural matters, which I certainly am not, if he favors the Buck amendment?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have not considered the Buck amendment with enough care to really answer the question. I shall be glad to look it over and tell the gentlewoman frankly what I think of it, though, of course, I do not claim to be an expert in such matters.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman give me an answer to that question before we conclude debate on this bill?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I shall be happy to give the gentlewoman my opinion. It will be my personal opinion, but I shall be happy to give that.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN], of course, is just part of a general scheme or strategy to try to restore to the committee bill what was in the Barden bill and defeated yesterday. He is undertaking to substitute the language of his bill for section 3 of the committee bill thereby reducing the actual number of hours permitted these processors and reducing the number of operations to which the additional hours are given.

There are some 16 different operations included in the committee bill and only about 4 in the amendment which the gentleman has offered. I anticipate that what he plans to do if he gets this amendment adopted is about as follows: When we get further on into the bill, where we amend section 13, he proposes to offer from his own bill a long list of operations which are to be exempted from both wages and hours entirely. If that does not happen, of course the amendment which he offers now will take away things that the committee is offering to people engaged in the processing of agricultural commodities. I think that is a fair statement of the situation we are about to vote on.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I am interested in the gentleman's statement because, as I understand it, under section 7 (c) there is exempt at the present time the processing of milk, whey, dairy products, sugarcane and so forth, and as the gentleman states, some 16 products under existing law, whereas under the Barden amendment only about four operations will be exempt. So that if this amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina is adopted, and we do not follow it up by adopting the part of the Barden bill known as section 13 (a), it will result in a limitation of the present law.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes, that is true; it will result in a limitation of the present law and the restriction of what the committee placed in its bill in section 3. Therefore, I hope that the Committee will reject the Barden amendment.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. The gentleman will agree, I believe, that some amendment is necessary in connection with the processing of livestock to correct the ruling of the Administrator, who has ruled that the exemption applies only to the employees on the killing floor. This ruling has in fact nullified the entire exemption of 14 weeks. I believe the gentleman will agree that some amendment is necessary to clarify that situation.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is talking about an amendment to the existing law now, not an amendment to the committee bill.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I will say that the committee bill legalizes the interpretation that has been given. It does not change the present law. The Barden amendment does help to clarify that situation.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is advocating, as I understand, an entire exemption for 14 weeks of all employees of any concern engaged in slaughtering cattle?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. In excess of the regular workweek.

Mr. RAMSPECK. This would include the office boys and everybody else?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Within the plant.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. It is impossible to exempt a portion of the employees. Say that one is exempted from overtime penalties and another is not, it would disturb the labor relations.

Mr. RAMSPECK. It may be that some amendment of that sort would be advisable, but I do not believe we ought to throw out section 3 of the committee bill with the 16 operations in which we are proposing to give a 60-hour week, in order to relieve complaints made against the Administrator's definition of area of production and substitute for it only four operations and a 56-hour week, when it may be that the further amendment the gentleman from North Carolina plans to offer to exempt from both wages and hours may be defeated. As the gentleman from Texas so ably said, if you really want any legislation, I think it would be very wise to stick more closely to the committee bill. It goes even further than some of the representatives of the administration wanted it to go, and they have criticized our going quite so far. Certainly, if we go further than that we are not going to get any legislation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time in order to answer our distinguished New Deal leader, the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD], who denounced the amendment which I offered on yesterday in order to make effective the Wage and Hour Act by protecting American business institutions, agricultural and industrial, and the employees therein, from the unfair, cheap, chiseling competition of foreign imports which are produced by workers who work as long as 90 hours a week and receive wages as low as $2 per week.

Since the gentleman indicated that the Republicans voted solidly for the amendment, I thank him for his testimony because the Republicans did vote for my amendment. Only five Members of the Democratic majority voted for this amendment. I am glad that the gentleman has so testified. The working men and women of the United States will know just how the members of the Republican and Democratic Parties stood on the highly important question of protecting our American agriculture and industry and our American workers from unfair, chiseling competition of cheap foreign products produced by workers who toil long hours for low wages.

The gentleman tried to ridicule this amendment and pointed out that it was impossible to put it into effect. He apparently does not know that there is now on the statute books the so-called Taber-Lenroot law of February 15, 1927, which requires that milk and cream imported from Canada and other foreign countries be produced under sanitary conditions established by the Secretary of Agriculture.

I also call his attention to the New Deal National Industrial Recovery Act, approved June 16, 1933, a copy of which I hold in my hand. You know what act that is, do you not? Barney Baruch's Blue Eagle legislation.

I suggest that the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD] get a copy of the Industrial Recovery or Blue Eagle Act and refer to subsections (e) and (f) of section 3, which proposed to do the same thing my amendment proposes to do, to protect industries which are regulated with reference to hours of labor and minimum wages from the unfair competition of cheaply produced, chiseling foreign imports, which are produced by workers who labor long hours for small wages. I believe our New Deal leader, the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD], who confessed a few moments ago on the floor of the House that the Republicans were practically the only ones who voted for my amendment to protect our American working men and women from unfair chiseling foreign competitors, had better read that Blue Eagle Act, for which he voted. Of course, he may have voted for it because he wanted to rubber stamp every proposed law which the New Deal bureaucrats sent to Congress.

You know that this National Recovery Act was Barney Baruch's Blue Eagle Act.

Mr. Chairman, subsections (e) and (f) of section 3 of the National Industrial Recovery Act, approved June 16, 1933, reads as follows:

(e) On his own motion, or if any labor organization, or any trade or industrial organization, association, or group, which has complied with the provisions of this title, shall make complaint to the President that any article or articles are being imported into the United States in substantial quantities or increasing ratio to domestic production of any competitive article or articles and on such terms or under such conditions as to render ineffective or seriously to endanger the maintenance of any code or agreement under this title, the President may cause an immediate investigation to be made by the United States Tariff Commission, which shall give precedence to investigations under this subsection, and if, after such investigation and such public notice and hearing as he shall specify, the President shall find the existence of such facts, he shall, in order to effectuate the policy of this title, direct that the article or articles concerned shall be permitted entry into the United States only upon such terms and conditions and subject to the payment of such fees and to such limitations in the total quantity which may be imported (in the course of any specified period or periods) as he shall find it necessary to prescribe in order that the entry thereof shall not render or tend to render ineffective any code or agreement made under this title. In order to enforce any limitations imposed on the total quantity of imports, in any specified period or periods, of any article or articles under this subsection, the President may forbid the importation of such article or articles unless the importer shall have first obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury a license pursuant to such regulations as the President may prescribe. Upon information of any action by the President under this subsection the Secretary of the Treasury shall, through the proper officers, permit entry of the article or articles specified only upon such terms and conditions and subject to such fees, to such limitations in the quantity which may be imported, and to such requirements of license, as the President shall have directed. The decision of the President as to facts shall be conclusive. Any condition or limitation of entry under this subsection shall continue in effect until the President shall find and inform the Secretary of the Treasury that the conditions which led to the imposition of such condition or limitation upon entry no longer exists.

(f) When a code of fair competition has been approved or prescribed by the President under this title, any violation of any provision thereof in any transaction in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce shall be a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof an offender shall be fined not more than $500 for each offense, and each day such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense.

Mr. Chairman, I intend again to offer my protecting amendment to this bill, and I ask all New Deal friends of American labor to follow the advice of your President. Let us have some action from the New Deal side in favor of protecting American working men and women from long hours and low wage chiseling foreign competition, and less talk.

Mr. Chairman, the Members of Congress have labored long hours today, discussing and considering wage and hour legislation. I therefore believe that a motion to rise and adjourn until tomorrow would be in order at this late hour. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an announcement to make. Several of the Members have come to me and stated that they have commitments for dinner tonight and have asked that we not continue in session. So in order to accommodate Members on both sides of the House, I now move, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAYBURN] having resumed the chair, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5435) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, had come to no resolution thereon.

GOLDEN GATE INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT SAN FRANCISCO IN 1940

Mr. DEMPSEY, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 481, Rept. No. 2060), which was referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed:

House Resolution 481

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 200, a joint resolution to provide for participation of the United States in the Golden Gate International Exposition at San Francisco in 1940, to continue the powers and duties of the United States Golden Gate International Exposition Commission, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF THE HATCH ACT

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the membership of the House will be very much surprised to learn that the great Committee on the Judiciary of the House today, as I am advised, tabled the so-called Hatch bill, Senate 3046.

I recognize there are Members of the House who are glad to see this done. I recognize some of the same Members would vote for the bill if it came out, but if it can be scuttled in committee, they are not put upon record, and with the country today being almost unanimously for this bill——

Mr. KELLER. What bill?

Mr. DEMPSEY. The amendment of the Hatch Act.

Mr. KELLER. The "Hatchet" law?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Did you ask me to yield to you?

Mr. KELLER. I am trying to get it straight.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, please do not take this interruption out of my time.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am very happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTON of New York. Can the gentleman tell us what the vote was in committee and how it was divided between the parties?

Mr. DEMPSEY. The vote in committee, as I understand, was in executive session, and when I say that, I mean in the extreme.

Mr. BARTON of New York. They did not want to be counted?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I shall be happy to yield to the distinguished gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I want to inform the gentleman from New Mexico that I am heartily in sympathy with his purpose to have this proposed legislation enacted into law.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I thank the distinguished minority leader.

I want to say to the House that I have introduced a resolution today asking the Rules Committee, by special order, to permit this bill to come to the floor and be considered by the House. On Friday I shall have a discharge petition on the Clerk's desk. So those who are in favor of clean politics and who are not in favor of using the Federal Treasury as a campaign fund [laughter]—I know some of you may not like to hear the truth, but you are going to hear more about the truth with respect to this bill than you have heard for a long time. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of 75 years of Negro progress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, April 30, the President issued a statement setting forth his reasons for making the proposed reorganization of the Civil Aeronautics Authority.

He stated that by placing the Authority in an executive department civil aeronautics would secure representation at the Cabinet table.

Prior to the creation of the Authority civil aeronautics had such representation. That representation did not prevent the Department of Commerce from making a woeful failure of the regulation and development of civil aeronautics. The Civil Aeronautics Authority now is an independent agency like the Interstate Commerce Commission. The reorganization would make it a subordinate Board. This blow to its prestige and dignity will not be compensated by alleged representation at a Cabinet table by a Secretary of Commerce so busy with a thousand and one details of running his Department that civil aeronautics will have to compete for attention with many other matters far less important to the national welfare.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is the gentleman's interest due to his having been an aviation official?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Yes. My experience as director of aeronautics of Ohio causes me to be interested in safe and sound aviation administration.

It was also stated that this shift into the Department of Commerce will permit a closer relationship with the air navigation chart service of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the reporting service of the Weather Bureau. The Weather Bureau is now in the Department of Agriculture and will be shifted into the Department of Commerce under the same plan which shifts the Civil Aeronautics Authority. Therefore the reason for the shift must be the present place of the Coast and Geodetic Survey in the Department of Commerce. But that survey engages to a very minor degree in aeronautical activities. It is of less importance to civil aeronautics than are 10 or a dozen other bureaus, agencies, and departments. Its aeronautical work represents only 4 percent of its entire activity.

The President's statement also says that the Authority will remain an independent Board continuing to appoint and control its own personnel and submit its own budget. But the President's reorganization order states in terms that budgetary and personnel functions must be performed under the direction of the Secretary through facilities he designates. The only independence provided for in the reorganization plan is that of rule making, adjudication, and investigation functions. The appointment of personnel and the making of expenditures are obviously not rule making, adjudication, or investigation. Therefore personnel and expenditures and budgetary matters are not independent of the Secretary under the terms of the reorganization plan but are shifted to the Department of Commerce and will be under the Secretary's control.

The President's statement also says that the proposed reorganization more clearly distinguishes between the functions of the Administrator and the Authority. On the contrary, the proposed reorganization splits safety regulation between the Administrator and the new Board. The Administrator will grant safety certificates and prescribe the terms and conditions therefor and the new Board will adopt safety rules. Obviously conflict between the two agencies will result. There are many other sources of conflict involved in this scrambling of functions. Under the present act the division of functions is clear cut. The Administrator is confined to construction and operation of air-navigation facilities and to promotional work. Any other duties are such as may be delegated to him by the Authority under the Authority's direction. The Authority itself has all regulatory duties.

The present act clearly distinguishes functions; the proposed reorganization mingles them under vague phraseology that will be open to grave differences of interpretation.

The President's statement likewise says that the abolition of the Air Safety Board and the transfer of its functions to the new Civil Aeronautics Board will not impair the present independence of accident investigation. However, the new Board will be adopting safety rules and also investigating accidents. This means that it will be investigating itself. This is not independence of accident investigation. The present act sets up a separate and independent investigating board, the Air Safety Board, charged entirely with the function of investigating accidents and having nothing to do with regulation. Therefore it is able to make impartial and fearless investigations and findings.

The President's statement likewise asserts that economies will result. It is true that the members of the Air Safety Board will be eliminated. Their salaries total $22,500. Unless the work of investigation is to be crippled, they will have to be replaced, so that the saving will not be that great. The only way to achieve economies will be by transferring some of the present functions of the Authority to the present personnel of the Department of Commerce. But such a move is one of the very evils to be guarded against. The Department of Commerce demonstrated its inability adequately to regulate civil aeronautics, and at the present time it has no familiarity whatever with the subject.

RETIREMENT PAY OF FORMER OFFICERS, ARMY, NAVY, AND MARINE CORPS

Mr. COLMER, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution, which was read and referred to the House Calendar, for printing under the rule:

House Resolution 483

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of S. 134, an act providing for continuing retirement pay, under certain conditions, of officers and former officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, who incurred physical disability while in the service of the United States during the World War, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Military Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered over the radio by the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include certain excerpts from an article by Dorothy Thompson on Central Europe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include several brief excerpts from the Lenroot-Taber Milk Act and from the National Industrial Recovery Act of July 16, 1933.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include two telegrams received from W. W. Thatcher, chairman of the National Farmers Union legislative committee, and the president of the National Federation of Grain Cooperatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] is entitled to recognition for 20 minutes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the lateness of the hour, I ask unanimous consent that I may have the same time on next Wednesday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

RESTORING CERTAIN BILLS TO THE PRIVATE CALENDAR

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, on April 2 three bills were objected to on the Private Calendar. I have two unanimous-consent requests to make. First, I ask unanimous consent that the bills H. R. 8226, H. R. 8379, and H. R. 7955 be restored to the calendar. I also ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Immigration be permitted to file supplementary reports on those three bills which they had not fully made at the time objection was made to the bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand that the Members who objected to those bills have now consented that they be restored to the calendar?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is right; and I am to file a supplemental report.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. In which you bring out additional evidence?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is right. I have talked to the Members on both sides of the aisle who objected.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are those the bills that were stricken from the Consent Calendar?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; they were objected to on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The Consent Calendar or the Private Calendar?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It was on the Private Calendar. They were objected to because the report was not full enough. I have talked to the gentlemen on both sides of the aisle and they have agreed to this consent.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. This simply restores them to the calendar and any Member of the House will have the opportunity to object later if he so desires?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is right. It also gives the committee the right to supply additional information in the supplemental reports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CLAYPOOL, for 1 week, on account of official business.

To Mr. RANDOLPH, for 4 days, on account of official business.

SENATE BILL REFERRED

SENATE

THURSDAY, MAY 2, 1940

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 24, 1940)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in whom we live and move and have our being, and who pourest on all who seek it the spirit of grace and supplication: We beseech Thee to keep alive in us this day the holy desires Thou dost impart. Do Thou sanctify all our thoughts and our endeavors; open the eyes of our minds and our hearts that we may endure, as seeing Him who is invisible. Draw us ever closer day by day in the bonds of holy friendship, where the hurts received in life's hard struggles are, in great measure, healed, the blows of adversity are softened, the pains of disappointment lessened, and the wounds of sorrow are bound up with the oil and wine of tender human sympathy. So link our purposes in life with Thine that in the darkest hours of doubt we may never forget that right is right and honor is honor, nor yet ever swerve from the path of rectitude. Teach us, dear Lord, that in the pilgrimage of duty the heart bursts into song, sorrow leaves the faithful soul which mounts on the wings of gladness, and, though weeping may endure for a night, joy cometh in the morning.

We ask these blessings in the name and for the sake of Him by whom all things were made, Thy Son Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day of Wednesday, May 1, 1940, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States, submitting nominations, were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 252) to amend section 5 (b) of the act of October 6, 1917, as amended, and for other purposes.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. MINTON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Byrd	Downey	Hayden
Ashurst	Byrnes	Ellender	Herring
Austin	Capper	Frazier	Hill
Bailey	Caraway	George	Holman
Bankhead	Chandler	Gerry	Hughes
Barbour	Chavez	Gillette	Johnson, Calif.
Barkley	Clark, Idaho	Glass	Johnson, Colo.
Bilbo	Clark, Mo.	Gurney	King
Brown	Connally	Hale	La Follette
Bulow	Danaher	Harrison	Lee
Burke	Davis	Hatch	Lodge
Lucas	Nye	Sheppard	Townsend
McCarran	O'Mahoney	Shipstead	Truman
McKellar	Overton	Smathers	Vandenberg
McNary	Pepper	Smith	Van Nuys
Maloney	Pittman	Stewart	Wagner
Mead	Reed	Taft	Walsh
Miller	Reynolds	Thomas, Idaho	Wiley
Minton	Russell	Thomas, Okla.
Murray	Schwartz	Thomas, Utah
Norris	Schwellenbach	Tobey

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY] is absent from the Senate because of illness in his family.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], the Senators from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT and Mr. NEELY], the Senators from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE and Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained on public business.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] is unavoidably detained.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that my colleague from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

LAWRENCE T. POST AND OTHERS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation for the relief of Lawrence T. Post, G. F. Allen, and D. Buddrus, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT OF OPERATIONS UNDER SOIL CONSERVATION AND DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT ACT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1938, of the operations under sections 7 to 14, inclusive, of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PETITION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a petition of sundry citizens of New York City, N. Y., praying for the enactment of House bill 801, the so-called Wagner-Van Nuys-Capper antilynching bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

THE STORY OF WASHINGTON—RESOLUTION OF CHIPPEWA FALLS LODGE, NO. 1326, B. P. O. E.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, recently it has been the great privilege of many Americans to read that great book, Tree of Liberty, by Elizabeth Page. It is truly one of the very few great American historical novels. To the student of history it is especially pertinent now because one can see that "the tides in the affairs of men" ebb and flow as they do in the great oceans. Right now the world and America, probably on a different or larger scale, are living through many of the same experiences that people lived through back in the days of the inception of this country.

In this book the stature of Washington is not diminished. He was truly a great man, a man of common sense, a man who understood his fellow men, a man who appreciated that great ideas were in conflict, and that men were simply the exponents of those ideas.

Mr. President, my reason for addressing the Chair at this time is that in my morning mail I received from the Elks' Lodge in my home town a resolution which I ask to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. This resolution brought to my attention a speech delivered by a distinguished lawyer of my home State, Frank L. Fawcett, on the subject, Washington, If He Were Alive Today. Mr. Fawcett, whose home is in Milwaukee, challenged the group before which he spoke with the statement, that with all the wealth of material on the life of Washington, no great drama or cinema has been written about his life, and he asks the question "Why?" He stated, and I believe he stated a great truth, that in this particular period a motion picture based on the life of Washington would serve a great constructive and patriotic purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

Having a supreme admiration for, and complete confidence in, the matchless leadership of our patriotic grand exalted ruler, Henry C. Warner; and

Believing in the far-reaching and beneficent effects of his thorough and thrilling program of Americanism; and

Having given unqualified endorsement to his dedication of the week of February 19 with the fond hope that it will rekindle the vestal spark of patriotic fervor of a Paul Revere and a Betsy Ross; and

Knowing that it will bring home to the consciousness of the American people their lasting indebtedness to the young Virginian who was "First in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen"; and

Being of the opinion that the production of a picture The Father of Our Country is a tribute long past due, and that the story of Washington and his unselfish sacrifice and service would inspire the citizenry of our beloved country to nobler and more patriotic efforts and again make Old Glory the symbol of freedom and the safeguard of our liberty: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That Chippewa Falls Lodge, No. 1326, send a copy of this resolution to our distinguished and patriotic Member, United States Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, that he may devise ways and means toward the consummation of this end by bringing it to the attention of the United States Senate.

Unanimously adopted April 9, 1940, by Chippewa Falls Lodge, No. 1326.

V. K. REMINGTON, Exalted Ruler.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BILBO, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 1770) granting a pension to Mittie Gaffney, reported it without amendment.

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 3645) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide books for the adult blind," approved March 3, 1931, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3693) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant permission for pipe lines, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1569) thereon.

RAILROAD COMBINATION IN THE EASTERN REGION (PT. 3 OF S. REPT. NO. 1182)

Mr. BARKLEY (for Mr. WHEELER), from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, submitted an additional report, pursuant to Senate Resolution 71, Seventy-fourth Congress, in connection with the investigation of holding and affiliated companies, relative to railroad combination in the eastern region, which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WAGNER:

S. 3906. A bill to amend the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, approved June 25, 1938, as amended June 20, 1939, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. HARRISON:

S. 3907. A bill to authorize the acceptance of donations of property for the Vicksburg National Military Park, in the State of Mississippi, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. HAYDEN:

S. 3908. A bill for the relief of Mrs. J. E. Purtymun and Mrs. B. H. Russell; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WALSH:

S. 3909. A bill to amend the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended;

S. 3910. A bill to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to furnish domiciliary and hospital care and medical treatment to World War veterans of the United States merchant marine, and for other purposes; and

S. 3911. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code with respect to merit rating under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act; to the Committee on Finance.

S. 3912. A bill for the relief of Louis Rosenstone; to the Committee on Immigration.

By Mr. OVERTON:

S. 3913. A bill to amend the Flood Control Act of June 15, 1936, as amended, to provide for adjustment of main Mississippi River levee grades; to the Committee on Commerce.

(Mr. PEPPER introduced Senate bill 3914, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and appears under a separate heading.)

ARMY PROMOTION SYSTEM—AMENDMENTS

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado submitted sundry amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9243) to provide for the promotion of promotion-list officers of the Army after specified years of service in grade, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ASSISTANT CLERK, COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS

Mrs. CARAWAY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 265), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 213, agreed to April 10, 1940, authorizing the Committee on Enrolled Bills to employ an assistant clerk, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, for the remainder of the present session, is hereby amended to include the time from the beginning of the session to the date of adoption of the said resolution.

STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MATERIALS

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution, have it read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 266) was read, as follows:

Whereas it is the policy of the National Government to increase the stocks of strategic and critical materials with a view to preventing the dependence of the United States upon foreign nations for supplies of such materials in times of national emergency: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of Commerce should make every effort to utilize to the fullest practicable extent any powers that they now possess for the purpose of acquiring, by purchase, exchange, or otherwise, stocks of materials determined to be strategic and critical materials in accordance with the act of June 7, 1939, and that the Secretary of the Treasury should determine the extent to which any such materials may be acquired in payment of the existing indebtedness of foreign governments to the Government of the United States, and the extent to which legislation may be required for the purpose of facilitating any such acquisition and the reduction of such indebtedness by means of such acquisitions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, when we considered the Strategic Materials Act, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] offered an amendment which would, in effect, have done the same thing which I am suggesting that we attempt to do. I then opposed the amendment because it had no place in that act.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] has submitted a resolution looking toward the acquirement of strategic materials by our Government through the use of certain funds which the Treasury Department can use. Therefore I deem this resolution to be not only consistent with the aim of the Senator from Massachusetts but also thoroughly consistent with one of the aims of the Senator from Delaware.

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES A. FARLEY ON AMERICA'S ROAD TO PEACE

[Mr. WALSH asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address by Hon. James A. Farley, at Boston, Mass., on Sunday, April 21, 1940, on the subject America's Road to Peace, which appears in the Appendix.]

ADDRESS ON FOREIGN POLICY BY HON. BRECKINRIDGE LONG

[Mr. CHANDLER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address on foreign policy delivered by Hon. Breckinridge Long, Assistant Secretary of State, at the Forum on Foreign Policy and National Defense at the National Institute of Government, May 2, 1940, which appears in the Appendix.]

CORPORATION DIRECTORS—ADDRESS BY RICHARD C. PATTERSON, JR.

[Mr. WAGNER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Richard C. Patterson, Jr., before the Harvard School of Business Administration, at Cambridge, Mass., on March 15, 1940, relative to the management of corporations, which appears in the Appendix.]

RECREATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES IN THE TENNESSEE VALLEY

[Mr. STEWART asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address by E. S. Draper, Director, Department of Regional Planning Studies, Tennessee Valley Authority, before the southeastern meeting of the American Automobile Association, Knoxville, Tenn., April 22, 1940, on the subject New Recreational Opportunities in the Tennessee Valley, which appears in the Appendix.]

LETTER FROM STEWART M'DONALD ON WORK OF FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION IN WYOMING

[Mr. SCHWARTZ asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed to him by Mr. Stewart McDonald, Administrator of the Federal Housing Administration, and a tabulation attached to the letter, showing by counties the extent of loans made by Wyoming banks and private-lending agencies operating in conjunction with the Federal Housing Administration, which appear in the Appendix.]

ADDRESS BY DR. ARTHUR TALMAGE ABERNETHY ON WAR

[Mr. REYNOLDS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject of war, delivered by Dr. Arthur Talmage Abernethy at Rutherford College, North Carolina, which appears in the Appendix.]

ARTICLE BY HUGH S. JOHNSON ON FOREIGN LOANS

[Mr. REYNOLDS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article by Hugh S. Johnson on the subject of foreign loans, which appears in the Appendix.]

SOUTH'S GREATEST RESOURCE—EDITORIAL FROM LEXINGTON HERALD

[Mr. CHANDLER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Lexington Herald entitled "South's Greatest Resource," which appears in the Appendix.]

REGULATION OF MODES OF TRANSPORTATION

[Mr. SHIPSTEAD asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a statement by a delegation of representatives of agricultural organizations, and a letter to the President of the United States, relative to the transportation bill, which appear in the Appendix.]

CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY AND AIR SAFETY BOARD

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, today there appeared in the Washington Times-Herald a very able article under the caption "Facts, Not Spinach," by Frank C. Waldrop. The article is a short one. I send it to the desk and ask that it be read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the article will be read.

The legislative clerk read the article, as follows:

FACTS, NOT SPINACH—A COMPARISON OF AIR SAFETY BEFORE AND AFTER THE C. A. A.

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

Mr. Roosevelt has displayed a very fancy talent for name-calling lately, brought out by objections to his proposed abolition of the independent Civil Aeronautics Authority in favor of a board subservient to the Secretary of Commerce.

As soon as he proposed this reversion, criticism was heard all about the country. He waved his cigarette holder and called it "spinach."

But the critics wouldn't shut up. They got louder. They came to Washington.

So Mr. Roosevelt put his cigarette holder down and abused them as "ignorant," "gullible," and/or "political."

It just happens that these ignorant, gullible, spinach dispensers have some facts which will permit them to avoid name calling entirely. They have only to point to the record. Here it is:

The Bureau of Air Commerce was abolished and the Civil Aeronautics Authority installed because the Bureau was a flop.

It had a duty to make the rules for civil aviation, enforce them, provide the system of aviation aids such as airports and radio beams and maps, and, finally, to cite the guilty if this set of rules and aids should fail to prevent a crash. That meant, of course, that the Bureau would have to be strong and able to criticize pilots, air-line managers, airplane makers, other branches of the Federal Government, and, finally, itself.

Did it work? Well, hardly.

Between March 4, 1933, and August 22, 1938, there were 39 fatal aircraft accidents on regularly scheduled runs of domestic aviation companies, in which 217 persons were killed.

The Bureau, as you can see by looking at the public record compiled throughout more than 3 years of congressional investigations, was not capable of acting as a sufficient controlling authority in aviation.

It was shown to be nothing but a cringing, politically addled little catch-all, into which the Secretary of Commerce dumped incompetent hacks and into which he stuck his fist whenever he wanted to prevent the hacks from really cracking down on chance-taking airplane operators. He usually wanted to.

Congress finally recognized that aviation is an extremely complex, difficult, and a rapidly changing industry needing intelligence, independence, and critical analysis to remain safe and at the same time progress—too volatile to endure such incompetence in government.

So it set up the Civil Aeronautics Authority to make the rules and operate the aids to aviation, and set up within the Authority the Air Safety Board to criticize those rules and aids and investigate any disasters with a view to publicizing the causes. The Board was a wholly independent governor on the engine of aviation—free to criticize the Authority, the air lines, the plane makers, or the pilots.

The C. A. A. and A. S. B. went into action on August 22, 1938. In the first 8 months of operation there were 3 fatal accidents, in which 17 persons died. In the more than 12 months since there have been none. There has been friction between Board and Authority—and there should have been. They were intended not to fraternize but to cross-check one another for safety's sake.

Is that spinach? Does that mean anything? Can you call pride in that ignorance, gullibility, or politics?

Mr. Roosevelt gives as his reason for tearing down this independent system and a return to the old the need of aviation for a "seat at the Cabinet table."

It had not one but two seats at the Cabinet table in February 1934, when he canceled the air-mail contracts on advice from his Postmaster General and Secretary of Commerce, and instructed a third Cabinet member, the Secretary of War, to see that the Army pilots would keep the air mail moving.

The disaster that followed, and the quick retreat, do not speak so very highly for Cabinet representation of aviation.

Does it matter whether aviation is represented at the Cabinet table if aviation is getting along all right not represented there and got along all wrong when it was?

Mr. Roosevelt can't spinach the facts away. The same planes, the same pilots, and the same companies are flying the same routes today they were from 1933 to 1938.

The only difference is they are flying them better, safer, and more often.

It is safer to leave them that way than to chance a return to the killing system of the past—and that's no spinach either.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask that immediately following the article read by the clerk there be inserted in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Washington Evening Star of yesterday and an editorial appearing in the Christian Science Monitor of yesterday, both on the same subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The editorials are as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of May 1, 1940]

INADEQUATE ANSWER

In striking back at critics of his reorganization order placing the Civil Aeronautics Authority within the Commerce Department and abolishing the Air Safety Board, President Roosevelt unfortunately has failed to reply to many important specific criticisms which have been raised against the plan.

In the 3 weeks since his order was announced, there has been an unceasing storm of criticism from all parts of the Nation and from virtually all of the national aeronautical organizations. During this period there has been scarcely a voice raised in support of the plan.

Such unanimity of opinion on so vital a question is difficult to discount. This criticism cannot be dismissed, as the President sought to do, by saying that it is actuated by "ignorance, gullibility, and politics." A great mass of this criticism undoubtedly has been sincere, and it has come from people identified with civil aviation who obviously are seriously disturbed by an Executive order which they consider unjustified and unwise.

A great deal of the criticism has been leveled against the abolition of the Air Safety Board. In his reply, Mr. Roosevelt told newsmen that the investigation of accidents can be done competently without having three men at the top who have been fighting each other all day long. He referred apparently to the Air Safety Board. As a matter of fact, the Air Safety Board has been composed of but two men since last November 21, when Col. Sumpter Smith resigned to take over chairmanship of the Interdepartmental Engineering Commission, which is building Washington National Airport. There has been no public evidence of any friction between the two remaining members, whose findings, obviously, have had to be unanimous, since disagreement would mean a deadlock.

The best evidence that the Civil Aeronautics Authority and the Air Safety Board are working well is the fact that the Nation's air transport system has been operating for more than a year without death or serious injury; that the great civil pilot-training program is going ahead with unparalleled safety; that the air lines are prospering and are handling passenger, mail, and express traffic which is increasing month by month in a succession of new all-time records.

For years civil aviation was regulated from within the Commerce Department. Much of that period was marked by inefficiency, wrangling, and a lack of results which was reflected throughout the industry. Conditions since creation of the Civil Areonautics Authority and the Air Safety Board, beyond any question, have improved very greatly. Why give up a system which is beneficial and successful to go back to one which has been tried and found wanting?

Congress is going to be asked to vote down the President's reorganization plan, and it should be voted down unless Mr. Roosevelt can make a more specific and more convincing answer to his critics.

[From the Christian Science Monitor of May 1, 1940]

NEED OF C. A. A. SHIFT UPHELD AS PRESIDENT ASSAILS CRITICS

WASHINGTON, May 1.—Official cognizance by President Roosevelt of the oppcsition to his Executive order transferring the Civil Aeronautics Authority to the Commerce Department brought a new phase to the controversy.

Mr. Roosevelt attacked opponents of his order, charging they are moved either by ignorance, gullibility, or politics.

He followed this up by calling Democratic members of the House Reorganization Committee to the White House for a conference after receiving reports that Senate and House Republicans are organizing to vote as a unit against his two latest reorganization plans.

Mr. Rocsevelt evidently was throwing his full weight into the rapidly developing fight. Stephen T. Early, Presidential secretary, said Mr. Roosevelt had been informed he faces organized opposition.

The fight was rapidly broadening beyond the contest over the Civil Aeronautics Authority order.

The order would end the present independent "three-in-one" agency made up of a five-man, quasi-judicial group, an Administrator, and an Air Safety Board, each of which is independent from the others in certain respects. Under the new Roosevelt plan the so-called Authority turns into the Civil Aeronautics Board, and it loses certain powers to the Administrator. The Air Safety Board is abolished. Its accident-investigation functions are shifted to the Civil Aeronautics Board.

Mr. Roosevelt at his press conference April 30 used the dispute to comment on the whole broad subject of governmental reorganization.

The difficulty with the President's job, he declared, is that there are so many independent agencies making direct reports to the Chief Executive that he is unable to master them all without expenditure of excess time. The better way, he said, is to have these groups headed up through a cabinet post, the chief of which is able to follow and digest the problems and reports to the President. Almost everybody, Mr. Roosevelt commented, seems to be in favor of higher efficiency and economy as "an abstract idea," but he added, "there is a rather discouraging collapse of enthusiasm when concrete proposals are made," especially on the part of those looking for "selfish protection of their own special interests."

Mr. Roosevelt singled out the appearance, in Washington, of a group of uniformed aviation pilots protesting the Roosevelt order calling themselves the "lobby to save lives."

"The implication that we are not interested in saving lives," wrote Mr. Roosevelt, "is certainly contradicted by the record of our progress in civil aviation during recent years."

Mr. Roosevelt was subjected to hard questioning at his press conference, and gave a testy defense of his move. The new set-up, he declared, with the Air Safety Board eliminated, is not a case of the authority being judge, jury, and prosecutor. At one point Mr. Roosevelt commented that the three men at the top of the present Air Safety Board, whose positions would be abolished by the transfer, have been fighting each other all day long.

Mr. Roosevelt threw in the personal observation with a rather grim smile that few members of the press could handle the amount of administrative detail that comes over the President's desk with all the independent agencies still uncorrelated; and he added that few other men would apply themselves to the task.

Legislative opposition to the Executive order is centering in Senator PAT MCCARRAN, Democrat, of Nevada. He has introduced a resolution to block the reorganization, and is enlisting congressional support.

PROHIBITION OF FOREIGN SILVER PURCHASES

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, an editorial from the New York Times of today entitled "The Silver Folly."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The editorial is as follows:

THE SILVER FOLLY

If it passes the pending Townsend bill, the Senate will at last have moved to wipe out the worst and most foolish part of a fantastic piece of legislation. The new bill prohibits the President and the Secretary of the Treasury from acquiring any more foreign silver under the Silver Purchase Act of 1934. That act provides that silver must be purchased until its monetary value, at $1.29 an ounce, equals one-fourth of the total value of the country's monetary gold and silver together. Despite the purchase of more than 2,200,000,000 ounces of silver since the act was passed, at a cost of more than $1,000,000,000, the inflow of gold has been so great that the goal set by the act is farther away than it was when the legislation was passed in June 1934. Of the silver purchased, the overwhelming bulk has been foreign. In 1939, for example, nearly five times as much foreign as domestic silver was acquired by the Treasury. The huge mountain of silver already acquired by the Treasury, in fact, is equal to more than 50 years' domestic production at the current rate.

The committee report in favor of the Townsend bill points out that the further purchase of foreign silver is without excuse; that it is wasteful of American resources; that it involves bestowal of benefits abroad without considerations of reciprocity; that there is no prospect of fulfilling the "treadmill terms" of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934; that that act has failed to achieve any of the objects promised by its sponsors in 1934; and that "silver buying is not a proper instrument of foreign policy." This country's uninterrupted purchasing of Mexican-produced silver since 1934, the committee remarks, "has not produced in Mexico the results which might be expected from such purchases viewed as a good-neighbor effort." As for the argument that purchase of foreign silver should be continued because, by giving foreigners purchasing power, it makes jobs for American producers of export commodities, the committee declares that if there were any validity in the argument "it would be a logical step to increase our buying price for silver five or ten fold, and thereby make five or ten times as many jobs for Americans."

The enactment of the Townsend bill would do nothing to end the indefensible provision which compels our Treasury to buy the total annual silver output of American mines at the fantastic price of 71 cents an ounce. It would, moreover, leave a messy legislative situation under which the Treasury would still be directed by an unrepealed act to move toward a goal the achievement of which the new act would make practically impossible. But at least the worst and most costly part of the silver folly would have come to an end.

PHILIPPINE TRAVEL-PAY BILL—VETO MESSAGE

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I desire to present a privileged matter. Yesterday the Committee on Claims took action and instructed me to present the matter to the Senate.

The Committee on Claims, to which was referred House bill 289, the Philippine travel-pay bill, which was returned by the President to the House of Representatives without his approval, and which was reconsidered and passed by that body, reports the bill back to the Senate with the recommendation that the bill be passed, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

I now move that the Senate proceed to reconsider House bill 289.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to reconsider the bill (H. R. 289) for the relief of officers and soldiers of the volunteer service of the United States mustered into service for the War with Spain and who were held in service in the Philippine Islands after the ratification of the treaty of peace, April 11, 1899.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement in reference to the matter.

On April 11, 1899, when the treaty of peace between this country and Spain was finally concluded, there were in the Philippine Islands between 12,000 and 15,000 State volunteers officers and men. Under the terms of their enlistment they were entitled to be mustered out of service at that time; and by the provisions of the statutes then in force, and still in force, I understand, they were entitled, upon being mustered out, to be transported to the place of their enlistment, or, in lieu thereof, to receive travel pay and allowances in the amount specified in the statute. However, in the weeks prior to April 11, 1899, the Philippine Insurrection had assumed a very serious aspect, and these volunteer soldiers were pretty well scattered in various parts of the islands attempting to quell the insurrection.

I was interested, in reading the official report made on this matter, to find that a few weeks before, prior to the time mentioned, these volunteer troops had beaten off the attacks of the insurrectionists, had advanced their lines beyond the blockhouses and remained in that position, but the First Nebraska Regiment had made the farthest advance, to the waterworks, a distance of 8 miles.

Because of the condition in the islands arising from the insurrection, the President and the War Department were very anxious that these volunteer soldiers should not exercise their right and demand their release from the Army. The report of the committee sets out the cablegram sent by The Adjutant General to General Otis, and his reply. The cablegram requested General Otis to ascertain whether these Volunteers would be willing to reenlist and remain in the islands for a further period, until the insurrection could be quelled. General Otis, under date of March 16, 1899, sent this cablegram from Manila to The Adjutant General at Washington:

> Believed after inquiry majority volunteer organizations willing to reenlist for 6 months from ratification of treaty, provided that upon original discharge are paid traveling allowances to places of muster in and that after expiration of second enlistment they are transported to those places by the United States.

So, according to the record, in all the various places where these volunteers were engaged, in the trenches, or in the dugouts, or wherever they were, their commanding officers presented the matter to them as to whether they would be willing to remain for another period, not to exceed 6 months, and almost without exception they acquiesced.

If it had been possible then to go through the formality of mustering those men out and immediately mustering them in again for a second enlistment, this proposal would not be before Congress today, because the men would then have had the legal right to what they now claim, because the statute gave them that right without any question. But because they were scattered, and for other reasons, that formality was not complied with, and they were not mustered out and mustered in again, so that they do not have a legal standing.

After the men had returned to this country, many of them attempted to present their claims to the accounting officers, or the Court of Claims, or wherever such matters would be presented, but it was denied that they had a legal right. However, there can be no question that the moral obligation rests fully upon the Government to carry out what the commanding officers of these volunteers told them would be done in the event they were willing to remain for another period of enlistment; and that is all this bill proposes to do.

On at least five different occasions the Senate has passed an identical measure. In the Seventy-fourth Congress both Houses passed the measure and it was vetoed, and the same thing occurred in the Seventy-fifth Congress. In the Seventy-sixth Congress the Committee on Claims, after further study of the matter, reported the bill unanimously, and it passed the House as well as the Senate, and is now before us again on the President's veto. Last week the House, by much more than the required two-thirds majority, voted to pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, and it seems to me that the Senate should take similar action.

Mr. President, let me add a further word. The question has been asked by a Senator beside me as to how much money is involved. According to the report submitted to the committee, payments would be made to between seven and eight thousand individuals, or, if they are deceased, to their representatives, that is, according to the statute, the widow, a child, mother, or father, or, if there were no relatives within those degrees, no payment would be made. The payments would average between three and four hundred dollars, making a total, as nearly as the committee could estimate, of $3,200,000.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I call the Senator's attention to the message of the President, in which, among other things, he said:

> However, approval of this bill would result in the payment of a gratuity to each of the officers and men concerned in an amount exceeding his pay for a full year, plus the value of rations for the period involved, in sea travel from the Philippines to the United States, a benefit utterly without warrant, since each individual concerned has already received transportation and subsistence at Government expense for the journey performed in addition to full pay for the entire time.

Will not the Senator explain that?

Mr. BURKE. I shall be very glad to. In the first place, there is a great deal of resentment, I find, at the use of the word "gratuity," which I think was unfortunately and by oversight used in the message, as these men claim, and with every semblance of fact and truth to bear them out, that this is not a gratuity at all; but that there was what amounted to a contract, a binding agreement, negotiated at the request of the President of the United States, speaking through The Adjutant General.

In reference to the further statement made, if the Senator from Illinois will read the message further, he will find that the President is referring not to the bill now before the Senate but to one of the previous measures, and he quotes from his veto message on the previous bill.

The amount then was somewhat larger, as the figures have been changed, and my understanding, as I have said—and the committee sought as definite information as could be secured—is that the total will not exceed $3,200,000. Even that amount is not to be paid at once, but, under the provisions of the bill, each claimant would be required to file his claim with the Accounting Office and make his proof showing that he was entitled to payment.

It is true, as the Senator will find, that when the second enlistment was over the men were transported back to the place of their enlistment, but in the Regular Army and in the volunteer army, if the men are actually mustered out when an enlistment expires, each soldier is entitled then to be transported back to the place of his enlistment, or, in lieu of that, to accept the travel pay and allowances. When the Army is anxious to secure a reenlistment a member of the regular force always takes his travel pay and allowances and reenlists, and when that enlistment period is over, he is transported back to the place of his enlistment. So that there is nothing unusual or out of the way about this procedure.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. BURKE. Certainly.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not believe the Senator from Nebraska has fully answered my question. I again refer to the part of the paragraph in the veto message which specifically says, "each individual concerned has already received transportation and subsistence at Government expense for the journey performed in addition to full pay for the entire time."

Mr. BURKE. There is no argument about that. These men enlisted for the first period, their service to terminate when the war was over, and of course they were paid a dollar a day, or whatever it was, during that period. Then, when they reenlisted, they received their pay of a dollar a day during that period, and when that enlistment was over, and the insurrection was at an end, they were transported at Government expense back to the place of their enlistment.

Mr. LUCAS. Were they paid for the service they rendered?

Mr. BURKE. They were paid the Regular Army pay, whatever it was; yes.

Mr. LUCAS. What are they seeking in addition to the Regular Army pay, and transportation from the islands back to the United States?

Mr. BURKE. They are seeking travel pay and allowances due them when their original enlistment expired. On the 11th of April 1899, when the treaty of peace was concluded, each and every one of these officers and men, under the terms of his enlistment, was entitled at that moment to be mustered out of the service and to be taken at Government expense back to this country, to the place where he enlisted. There is no argument about that. In lieu of that, if they wanted to remain in the Philippines or to do anything else, they could take the amount specified in the pending bill, and provided by statute. But the Government being anxious to have them remain for another period, instead of transporting new volunteers from the United States to the Philippines, said to these men, in effect, "If you will reenlist now we will pay you the travel pay and allowances which you are entitled to accept in lieu of being taken back to the United States. Serve your next period and of course we will then transport you home."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, that is a point about which I wanted to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understood the Senator to say that it is customary in the Army, probably not through any legal provision, but is a custom, or a practice, that when an enlistment expires, the soldier has the option of returning home——

Mr. BURKE. It is under a specific provision of the statute.

Mr. BARKLEY. He can either return home at Government expense, or he can receive what is called a travel allowance at that time, and then reenlist. Is that correct?

Mr. BURKE. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that if he reenlists he receives a travel allowance, although he does not travel. Although he does not return home, he receives what he would have received if he had returned home?

Mr. BURKE. I thank the Senator. That brings out the point very clearly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then, if he reenlists, he later returns home at Government expense. Did these men collect the travel allowance?

Mr. BURKE. They did not; and that is why this bill has been introduced. They have been denied that benefit from that time to the present.

Mr. BARKLEY. To what extent have soldiers who served in the Philippines or elsewhere, and who reenlisted, been allowed to collect travel pay and allowances for expenses which they did not incur?

Mr. BURKE. My understanding is that in every case of reenlistment travel allowance is paid.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is that a provision of the statute?

Mr. BURKE. Yes; the statute so specifically provides.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. The testimony before the Committee on Claims showed that a good many of these soldiers were smart enough to see the situation, and they insisted upon being discharged, and then reenlisted. They thus obtained their travel pay back to the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, they insisted on being discharged and then collected their travel allowance in cash?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. And then reenlisted and were later brought back to the United States at the Government's expense.

Mr. BROWN. Yes. And the men in question are not now in the same position as the men were in who were discharged and insisted upon reenlisting.

Mr. BARKLEY. Are there included in this bill any of those who got their discharge, got their travel pay, reenlisted, and then subsequently were transported back to the United States?

Mr. BURKE. No; they are specifically excluded. That is the reason why the bill reads as it does. It requires each one who makes a claim to present it to the proper Government department so that proof can be had on it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Did the men in question reenlist without being discharged?

Mr. BURKE. They were not formally mustered out. They reenlisted for a period not to exceed 6 months, and they all stayed from 4 to 6 months or until their services were no longer required. Some of them, I think, were even kept for a 7-month period.

Mr. BARKLEY. I still do not understand all that I know about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURKE. I think the majority leader has brought out clearly just what the situation was. Regular Army soldiers whose term of enlistment may expire at any time in the year, depending on when they entered the service, if they are in China, or the Philippines, or any place else, when their terms of enlistment expire are entitled to be transported back to the place at which they enlisted, or in lieu thereof to take their travel pay and allowances. If they choose to stay and reenlist, they receive their travel pay and allowances, and at the end of the reenlistment, if they have enough of Army life, they are transported back to the United States at Government expense.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator said some soldiers were smart enough to be mustered out and get their travel pay and allowances. Why were not the others as smart? They all knew about it; did they not?

Mr. BURKE. The individuals to whom I am referring who received travel pay and allowances were members of the Regular Army. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] stated, and I now recall it to be the fact, that there were individuals among the volunteers, legally trained or otherwise, who insisted upon the formality of being mustered out, and then being immediately mustered in for the next period of service, and in those cases they were paid immediately, under the statute, the exact amount of travel pay and allowances that would be paid to one in like circumstances under this bill who did not stand upon his legal rights and say, "I want to be mustered out and mustered in again right away so that I can get that pay."

Mr. BARKLEY. Did the officers of the Army have any authority to hold out or make the promise that the men who reenlisted without being mustered out would be given this travel pay?

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. The average private in the Army does not seriously consider what the authority of the head of the Army is; when that officer speaks, he takes his authority for granted.

Mr. BURKE. I quote from the hearings of January 10, 1931, in part, as follows:

> Section 15 of the Army bill reads, in part, as follows: "That the President is authorized to enlist temporarily in service for absolutely necessary purposes in the Philippine Islands, volunteers, officers, and men, individually or by organizations, now in those islands and about to be discharged, provided their retention shall not extend beyond the time necessary to replace them by troops authorized to be maintained under the provisions of this act and not beyond a period of 6 months."

In accordance with that provision of the statute The Adjutant General cabled to General Otis as follows:

> The President inquires as follows:
> "If we are not able to get you sufficient forces to replace volunteers under your command before exchange of ratification of treaty, will you be able to enlist your present volunteer force under this section?"
> By order Secretary of War.

In reply to that message, General Otis, who was in command, cabled as follows:

> MANILA, March 16, 1899.
> ADJUTANT GENERAL,
> Washington:
> Believed after inquiry majority volunteer organizations willing to reenlist for 6 months from ratification of treaty, provided that upon original discharge—

They were never really actually discharged—> are paid traveling allowances to places of muster in and that after expiration of second enlistment they are transported to those places by United States.

> OTIS.

I do not find anywhere in the record any answer to that cablegram of General Otis, but apparently the conditions laid down were accepted. There was no denial of it. The men were kept in the service for the other period, and everything was done except actually to go through the formality of mustering them out and immediately mustering them in again.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The transaction out of which this measure grows occurred 42 years ago. There have been three vetoes of similar bills by the present Chief Executive, one of which was in the Seventy-fourth Congress and one in the Seventy-fifth Congress.

Mr. BARKLEY. One was a pocket veto, upon which Congress, of course, could not pass. I have forgotten whether there were votes to override the vetoes of the other measures or whether they died simply as the result of the vetoes.

Mr. BURKE. No; there was no vote to override.

Mr. BARKLEY. Prior to the Seventy-fourth Congress and during all the time since the Spanish-American War, what has been done by Congress in the way of the enactment of a law to make this payment, and if Congress passed a law, what happened to it?

Mr. BURKE. I think there has been a bill before every session of Congress, with the possible exception of the first Congress after the hostilities ceased, at which time the men were under the impression that they had a right to get this pay without any action of Congress. They proceeded on that theory for a little while, until it was finally determined that, because they were not actually mustered out and again mustered in, they had no legal standing, and very shortly after the war and at every session of Congress thereafter bills were introduced providing for making these payments; hearings were had before the committees; sometimes bills would pass one House and not the other, but on at least three occasions which have been mentioned, during the present administration, the bill has passed both Houses.

Let me add that when the bill in the Seventy-fifth Congress was passed and vetoed, it seemed to some of us that there were certain logical objections to the bill in that it might be possible under that measure for some individuals to claim benefits who would not be entitled to them. It provided for an outright payment without having the matter examined, as now provided in this bill and did not make it clear that those who were wise enough to be mustered out and mustered in, and received their pay, would not be paid over again.

So the bill this year was drawn with the idea of removing what appeared to be rather valid objections, and I may say frankly to the Senator from Kentucky that it was a great surprise to the members of the committee and to all who were familiar with the matter that the measure should come back with a veto. The only reason—if I may say it, and this is largely assumption on my part—the only reason I can see why this unfortunate occurrence has happened is that the Chief Executive in exercising his veto on this occasion had in mind the previous bill. He does not refer to the present bill at all, but cites from objections he urged to the passage of the previous bill. It has been stated to me by one who should know what he was talking about that the War Department and, I believe, the Veterans' Administration—I do not know whether they have anything to do with it—but three different departments of the Government have submitted memoranda favoring the enactment of the present bill. I do not vouch for that statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have only one other observation to make. I would not deny to any American citizen the payment of any just claim because of its age. But the fact that the events in question occurred so long ago; that the Congresses closer to the events did not take action; and that only in the last 3 or 4 years has Congress taken action raises the presumption of a burden of proof on the part of those who advocate the payment to show that it is a just claim and that it ought to be paid.

Mr. BURKE. I agree with that statement very fully, and for that reason I have been taking a very active part in opposition to a proposal to pay several million dollars on the French spoliation claims which originated in the period from 1792 to 1800, and also with respect to a very large number of claims growing out of the War of 1812, and many out of the Civil War, some of which, however, have been passed in very recent years.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. GILLETTE. I thought perhaps I could contribute something to remove the misconception which is apparent on the part of some of my colleagues. I happened to be a soldier at the time in question, not in the Philippines, but at Chickamauga Park. We had enlisted for the duration of the war. The war was over and our term of enlistment had expired. Every soldier was called in by his company commanding officer, and his patriotism was appealed to on this ground:

> While you enlisted for the duration of the war, and your term of enlistment is over, and are entitled to go home, and to receive your transportation home, an unsettled period is going to follow during which the Government will require the services of soldiers. You owe it to your Government. The patriotism which induced you to volunteer ought to carry over and induce you to stay in the service. We are requesting you to stay in the service instead of demanding your discharge and transportation to the point of your enlistment.

Some of the men did as requested, and some did not. The men in the Philippines had the same proposal put to them. Every man whose term of enlistment had expired was entitled to be brought back to the United States, or, in lieu thereof, to receive travel pay and subsistence allowance. The men were urged to stay. They stayed at the request of their officers, who appealed to their patriotism.

As I see it, there is no legal obligation to pay these men. They were finally brought back to the United States. However, at that time they could have demanded that they be brought back, or that they receive in lieu thereof travel pay and subsistence allowance, because the Government would have been required to send additional men to take their places. However, because they listened to the appeal to their patriotism, it seems to me there is every implied obligation on the part of the Government to pay this claim.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Why did not the Government insist that all the men be mustered out and then mustered in at that particular time, in view of the fact that a certain number of them were mustered out and mustered in?

Mr. BURKE. The chief objection to going through the ceremony of mustering them out and mustering them in again was that they were scattered all over the islands. As I stated earlier, the First Nebraska Volunteers had advanced through the enemy territory. In fact, the colonel of the regiment was killed at about that very time. They were engaged in warfare, perhaps not on the scale of that now going on in Norway, but just as serious and deadly. The Government could not call the men in to go through what, after all, was only a formality. They all knew what it was about. They knew that they were to stay for another period, not to exceed 6 months; and they did not do what they probably should have done—that is, insist that they be taken to Manila, or wherever the mustering-out and mustering-in could take place.

Mr. LUCAS. Let me ask a further question: Does the record of the hearings show how many men are affected by the bill?

Mr. BURKE. No one can say with absolute certainty, because some have died and have left no widows, children, mothers, or fathers. In such a case the payment lapses. However, the best estimate we are able to make is that the number is about 8,000. I notice in the veto message that the number is referred to as 15,000; but the information we have is that there were not to exceed 12,000 Volunteer troops in the islands on the 11th of April 1899, and that of that number, some were paid at the time, and others have died without relatives in the degree of consanguinity required to entitle them to the benefit of the bill. The number is about 8,000.

Mr. LUCAS. The bill provides that the widow, children, mother, or father shall be paid?

Mr. BURKE. The widow, children, mother, or father, in accordance with the statute.

One further statement before I conclude: Overriding a Presidential veto has always impressed me as being one of the most serious and thought-provoking acts a Member of the National Legislature is called upon to perform. During the brief period I have served in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, in every instance, with one exception, I have voted to sustain the veto of the President, although in some cases it seemed to me there was much merit on the other side. However, in the case of this particular bill, with which I have long been familiar, I am very sure that justice, right, and fair dealing require that this very belated payment be made. Therefore I shall freely and gladly vote to pass the measure notwithstanding the veto of the President.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point an excellent statement by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] on the pending pay bill.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR ARTHUR CAPPER

I shall support the motion of the Senator from Nebraska that House bill 289, commonly known as the Philippine travel pay bill, be passed over the veto of the President.

The bill provides for travel pay and allowances for officers and enlisted men of the Volunteer services who remained in service in the Philippines in 1899 beyond the term of their enlistment, and after ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain on April 11, 1899.

This bill simply provides for payments to these men that should have been made 40 years ago. I hope the Senate will do as the House of Representatives did, and pass the bill notwithstanding the Presidential veto. The House passed the measure over the veto by a vote of 274 to 72, as I recall.

During the War with Spain several regiments of volunteers were in active service in the Philippines. They were in service on April 11, 1899, when their terms of enlistment expired, and they were entitled to be discharged and returned to their homes. Under the terms of their enlistment, and under regulations, they were entitled to travel pay and a subsistence allowance from the Philippines to their homes, or to the points where they were mustered into service.

In the spring of 1899 a serious situation existed in the Philippines. Aguinaldo and some 30,000 Philippine troops, who had been trained by, and who had cooperated with, the American troops against the forces of Spain, had started an insurrection in February of that year. The fighting was at its height in April, when the terms of enlistment of these men expired.

If they had been in the Regular Army, and had reenlisted, they would have received as a bounty travel pay and subsistence to their home stations.

The War Department was very anxious to have these volunteers remain in the islands and finish the job of subduing the insurrection. To replace them at that time would have been very difficult; in fact, the campaign would have had to be halted until fresh troops could be sent from the United States.

There was an exchange of telegrams between Adjutant General Corbin and General Otis, commanding the American forces in the Philippines. In answer to a cablegram from Adjutant General Corbin, on March 16, 1899, General Otis had replied as follows:

"Believe after inquiry majority Volunteer organizations willing to reenlist for 6 months from ratification of treaty, provided that upon original discharge are paid traveling allowances to places of muster in, and that after expiration of second enlistment they are transported to those places by the United States."

The substance of this communication was presented to the men by their officers, and almost to a man they agreed to remain beyond the date of treaty ratification if their services were needed. Presumably they would have reenlisted, but the campaign developed in such a way that this formality was ignored.

In the latter part of March a general advance was ordered against the insurrectionists, and from then until June—longer than that for some of the men—the volunteers were in the field. The troops were continually on the move, under very bad conditions, poorly equipped, under a tropical sun, in the jungles much of the time, continually harassed by the enemy. The result was that they never actually were reenlisted. They just kept on fighting until the insurrection was quelled.

There never seems to have been any question as to the understanding had on all sides that the men were to receive travel pay and allowances as one of the conditions of their remaining in service.

I never have understood why the Government of the United States, under these circumstances, stood on the technicality that these men had not been formally discharged from their original enlistment and therefore had not been reenlisted.

There is no argument as to the technical soundness of the position taken by the Government, but these brave men had not stood on a technicality when their enlistments expired on April 11, 1899. They did not stand in their tracks; nor did they sulk in their tents. They did not say, "Our terms of enlistment are up. We will not fight another day unless we are formally discharged, reenlisted, and get our travel pay and allowances." They thought they had an agreement that would amount to a contract with their Government, and they lived up to their agreement. They kept faith with the terms of the implied contract.

It has been argued that these veterans are asking for a gratuity from the Government. It has been stated that they finally traveled home at Government expense and now are trying to collect twice. I do not share that belief. I do not accept that statement as the truth. These veterans simply are asking for belated justice—40 years belated—in the payment of an honest debt—a debt honestly incurred but not honestly carried out by our Government.

I say that men who offered their lives on the battlefield ought not to have to plead with their Government to pay them what was promised them at the time. I trust the Senate will do what the House already has done—enact this legislation, notwithstanding the veto of the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding? On this question the Constitution requires that the vote be by yeas and nays. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll, and called the name of Mr. ADAMS, who voted in the affirmative.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, does the Constitution also require that the veto message be read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that it was read.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the roll call has already started, but, I think, by unanimous consent, the veto message could be read for the information of the Senate. It was read a week or so ago.

I ask unanimous consent that the roll call be suspended until the message can be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the roll call will be suspended and the message will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I am returning herewith, without my approval, H. R. 289, a bill for the relief of officers and soldiers of the volunteer service of the United States mustered into service for the War with Spain and who were held in service in the Philippine Islands after the ratification of the treaty of peace, April 11, 1899.

The provisions of this bill are almost identical with the provisions of H. R. 2024 of the Seventy-fifth Congress, which I returned to the Congress without my approval on September 22, 1935, and the provisions of H. R. 2904 from which I withheld my approval and indicated the reasons therefor in my memorandum of disapproval dated June 20, 1938. The principal reasons for withholding my approval from the two bills in question are set forth in my memorandum of June 20, 1938, in connection with H. R. 2904, as follows:

The effect of this bill is that the beneficiaries thereof "shall be entitled to the travel pay and allowance for subsistence provided in sections 1289 and 1290, Revised Statutes, as then amended and in effect, as though discharged April 11, 1899, by reason of expiration of enlistment, and appointed or reenlisted April 12, 1899, without deduction of travel pay and subsistence paid such officers or soldiers on final muster out subsequent to April 11, 1899."

I am advised by the Secretary of War that there were approximately 15,000 officers and soldiers of the volunteer forces of the United States in the Philippine Islands at the conclusion of peace with the Kingdom of Spain who would become beneficiaries of this act.

The Comptroller General in his report on February 23, 1935, advises that the enactment of this bill would authorize payment of travel pay at the rate of 1 day's pay and one ration for each 20 miles, inclusive of the distance by water from the Philippine Islands to San Francisco, approximately 8,000 miles, and that such payments for the water travel alone will exceed 1 year's pay plus 1 day's ration for each day of such period. It is estimated the cost of the legislation will approximate $7,000,000.

Congress has heretofore recognized the service of these officers and men by the award of a special medal, and there was also an allowance by the act of Congress approved January 12, 1899, of 2 months' extra pay to all volunteers who served honestly and faithfully beyond the continental limits of the United States. I join most heartily in recognizing and appreciating the patriotic service of these men.

However, approval of this bill would result in the payment of a gratuity to each of the officers and men concerned, in an amount exceeding his pay for a full year, plus the value of rations for the period involved in sea travel from the Philippines to the United States, a benefit utterly without warrant, since each individual concerned has already received transportation and subsistence at Government expense for the journey performed in addition to full pay for the entire time.

I have recently signed an act restoring pensioners of the War with Spain and Philippine Insurrection to their full rate of pension. I feel that no breach of trust has been committed by the Government as regards the men who served their country in the War with Spain and Philippine Insurrection and, from the facts in this case, general legislation upon this subject, as provided in H. R. 2024, is not deemed advisable.

In view of the fact that the circumstances involved in this proposal are the same as they were when the previous bills were under consideration, I find no justification for changing my position with respect thereto.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 23, 1940.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will resume the calling of the roll.

The legislative clerk resumed and concluded the calling of the roll.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LUCAS. My colleague [Mr. SLATTERY] is unavoidably detained from the Senate because of illness in his family. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS], the Senators from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT and Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are absent from the Senate on public business. I am advised that if present and voting, these Senators would vote "yea."

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] are in conference in Government departments. I am also advised that if present and voting, these Senators would vote "yea."

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] are unavoidably detained.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are necessarily detained.

The result was announced—yeas 76, nays 3, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two-thirds of the Senators present having voted for the passage of the bill on reconsideration, the bill is passed, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8438) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BYRNES. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BYRNES, Mr. GLASS, Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. OVERTON, Mr. WALSH, Mr. HALE, and Mr. LODGE conferees on the part of the Senate.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, COMMERCE, JUSTICE, AND FOR THE JUDICIARY—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. McKELLAR submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8319) making appropriations for the Departments of State, Commerce, and Justice, and for The Judiciary, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 7, 12, and 21.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 5, 8, 9, 10, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 23, 25, 26, 27, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 36, and 37, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended to read as follows: "Bureau of Interparliamentary Union for Promotion of International Arbitration, $10,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$8,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert: "$1,083,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert: "$110,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert: "$308,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert: "$1,325,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 20: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the amount named in said amendment insert "$7,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the amount named in said amendment insert "$7,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,650,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 35: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert: "$187,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference report in disagreement amendments numbered 28 and 29.

PROHIBITION OF FOREIGN-SILVER PURCHASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 785) to repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, to provide for the sale of silver, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but briefly in presenting my argument in opposition to the bill of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] proposing to prohibit the purchase of foreign silver. Before proceeding with my discussion I desire to review certain facts in relation to our monetary purchasing policy, including both silver and gold, which probably have been stated already, but I desire somewhat to recast the statements that have been made.

Mr. President, we are sending abroad immense sums of money for the purchase of gold and silver. As a matter of fact, during the last calendar year we imported in gold and silver $3,640,000,000. To understand the full amount of that sum, let me state it in this way, that we could, by expending that sum in America, have built a million homes at an average cost of $3,600; or the amount of money that we annually spend for the purchase of gold and silver would support from twelve to fifteen million people.

I agree with practically all the economists and bankers that the tremendous flow of gold and silver into the American Nation is steadily building a greater and greater problem, because, being a great exporting country and a great creditor nation, it is unlikely that we will ever again be able to use our gold or silver in the settlement of our accounts with foreign nations. Consequently, I am in sympathy with the distinguished Senator from Delaware in his effort to work out some rational solution of our gold-silver problem. But I must admit that I am somewhat astounded at the emphasis the Senator from Delaware places upon the silver-purchasing policy as contrasted with the gold-purchasing policy.

Why do I say that? I say that because of the amount of money that we spent for the precious metals in 1939 over three billion and a half dollars went for the purchase of gold and only $70,000,000 for the purchase of silver.

Thus 98 percent of the total amount of money expended went for gold and less than 2 percent went for silver. Consequently it immediately becomes apparent that the distinguished Senator from Delaware is exercising his energy and his talent on less than 2 percent of the inflowing precious metals. Thus what we are attempting to do here will hardly at all tend to solve this very serious problem. But, as I shall attempt to show very briefly later, Mr. President, it will to a great extent devastate our commerce with Mexico and may sadly injure our relations with our closest neighbor to the south.

Mr. President, as the distinguished Presiding Officer (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair) knows better than anyone else here, not only are we importing 50 times as much gold as silver but we are paying 100 times as much for gold as we are for silver. We only pay 35 cents an ounce for silver and we are paying $35 an ounce for gold. I have been told by the best experts I could find that, if and when there is a collapse of gold and silver as monetary standards, if that time ever comes, gold will probably drop to $8 or $9 a pound from $500 a pound, but silver for commercial purposes will, at least, always have a value of from $3 or $4 a pound, and at 35 cents an ounce it is only worth about $5 a pound. In other words, if there should be an ultimate collapse of the monetary value of gold and silver, gold must fall from $35 an ounce, while silver would only fall from 35 cents an ounce; and there is not very much difference in the value of the two metals for commercial purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I desire to corroborate in part the statement of the distinguished Senator from California. He will remember that Mr. Keynes, as well as other writers upon gold and silver and upon monetary questions, have admonished us that there is a danger of the concentration of substantially all the gold of the world in one or two countries, in which event it would then be treated as redundant currency, and other nations would demonetize gold as many have demonetized silver.

I think the Senator is right in challenging attention to the danger of our concentrating the gold. We have committed, perhaps, as great a crime in the concentration of gold as the Senator from Delaware thinks we have by the purchase of silver.

Mr. DOWNEY. I thank the Senator from Utah for his contribution to this subject, about which he, too, is an expert, and I am very much of a layman.

So, Mr. President, we may start with the knowledge that we face the possibility of great loss in our accumulating gold hoards, while the loss that may come from buying silver, even at 71 cents an ounce, can never be very great. I am not going to repeat the arguments which have been made by the present distinguished Presiding Officer as to the future possibility of the use of silver for monetary purposes in India, China, and elsewhere, and the possibility of an increase in the value of silver after the present European war is over, because those arguments are already in the RECORD more exhaustively and more authoritatively than I could offer them.

I desire, however, to suggest another vital difference resulting from the importations of gold and silver. It is generally conceded that practically all the silver which comes into America is for the settlement of debts accumulated through the purchase of our wealth being currently produced. That means that for every dollar of additional purchasing power that we can give to Mexico Americans who otherwise would not be employed will be employed in manufacturing goods to satisfy that demand; and I desire to repeat this statement for the attention of the distinguished proponent of this bill. I have said that as far as silver is concerned, the $70,000,000 which we are importing employs in the production of goods vitally needed by Mexico probably about 70,000 Americans who otherwise would not be working. If that purchasing power were not coming into the United States there would be no substitute for it; and to that extent our unemployment would be increased.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We are taking silver for the goods which we are sending to Mexico, are we not?

Mr. DOWNEY. That is correct.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator agree with the general consensus of opinion, with the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, and with the 12 members of the Federal Advisory Council, that the purchase of foreign silver is a waste of our substance; in other words, that we have no need whatever for the silver?

Mr. DOWNEY. Unfortunately, the Senator from Delaware was absent when I made part of my argument.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am sorry.

Mr. DOWNEY. Yes; I regret it, too, because I do not want to detain the Senate by a repetition of what I have already said. Let me say to the distinguished Senator, however, that I will cover the question he has now asked me just a stage further in my argument; but I want to make this point clear at this time, and I shall be glad to have the distinguished Senator from Delaware comment upon it: I am now contrasting the evil effect of this tremendous tide of inflowing gold compared with any effect of the inflowing silver; and I have already pointed out, let me repeat to the distinguished Senator, that for every dollar of silver that is coming in, $50 of gold is coming in; that this bill attempts to strike at only 2 percent of the problem which is involved. I have also pointed out that we are paying 100 times as much per ounce for gold as for silver, and that, if there is a collapse in the monetary value of gold and silver, gold must plunge almost to the price of silver, but silver is now very near its value for commercial purposes.

I have stated the next point, and that is that silver is used to buy our actual goods and wealth produced by men and women who would not be employed unless they were producing to satisfy the market created by our purchases of silver; but as far as gold is concerned, let us reflect upon this fact: Out of the $3,500,000,000 expended for its purchase, less than $800,000,000 is used in the purchase of goods currently being produced in America, because our favorable international balance of trade last year was only about $800,000,000. That was satisfied in gold; but, beyond that, over two and one-half billion dollars of gold came into the United States, some of it to be temporarily earmarked, but all of it ultimately to flow into the purchase of our stocks, our bonds, and our real estate. So, Mr. President, we may safely say that silver which comes into the United States is used to buy machinery and other goods that would not be produced if it were not for our silver policy; but three-fourths of our inflowing gold is being used to buy existing forms of property and to increase the holdings of wealth of foreigners in the United States.

Mr. President, I also desire to point out the fact that mining is the great industry of Mexico. Mining in Mexico is very similar to the automobile business in this country. The distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] has seemed to assume that, if we should stop purchasing silver and silver should drop to 20 or 25 cents an ounce, all that Mexico would lose should be figured on present producton at 25 cents, rather than 35 cents, an ounce. But, as the distinguished presiding officer [Mr. PITTMAN] would explain the matter far better than I, many mines in Mexico that could not operate at 25 cents an ounce can operate at 35 cents an ounce. As a matter of fact, most of the great, high-grade silver properties of Mexico have been exhausted by mining covering centuries of commerce; and many of the mines of Mexico that can do business at 35 cents an ounce would be totally dismantled and shut down at 25 cents an ounce.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then the Senator is keenly interested in keeping the mines of Mexico open?

Mr. DOWNEY. Yes; I am, Mr. President. I want America to do everything in its power to promote Mexican prosperity. A large portion of Mexican silver comes as a byproduct in the mining and milling of other metals, notably in the production of gold, lead, zinc, and copper. With silver at 20 to 25 cents an ounce in Mexico, many of the other mines in Mexico—lead, zinc, copper, and gold—will be compelled to close or to curtail their operations.

As a matter of fact, I may say to the distinguished Senator from Delaware that it is the consensus among mining experts in Mexico that the cessation of the purchase of silver at 35 cents an ounce, if silver then drops to 20 or 25 cents an ounce, will be a devastating blow to the mining industry of Mexico that will seriously affect the well-being and the prosperity of all its citizens.

I have a distinguished friend, one of the best-known business leaders of America, who probably knows Mexico better than any other American that I know. He is a man of highest integrity, conservatism, and accuracy, Mr. E. R. Jones. He is the president, and I think the main owner, of the Wells-Fargo & Co. Express, S. A., operating in Mexico, and doing a large business there. He is not a Democrat. He is not a new dealer. He is a follower, I believe, of the same type of Republican orthodoxy to which my distinguished colleague from Delaware belongs.

I asked Mr. Jones to express to me in a letter his opinion of the effects upon Mexican commerce and our Mexican relations if we should now end the purchase of silver from Mexico. He did so in an interesting and valuable communication which I here hold in my hand. I am not going to read it, but I do want for the benefit of the RECORD to read two very brief quotations from it.

Mr. E. R. Jones begins by saying:

> As you know, I am not a Democrat, neither am I a supporter of the New Deal; but I do try to be eminently fair in my consideration of all political subjects. Therefore I must express to you my sincerest view on this one question, and to say that you are perfectly at liberty to quote this on the floor of the United States Senate or any other place you see fit.
>
> It is this: I am in sympathy with President Roosevelt's silver-purchase policy and his gold-purchase policy. Inasmuch as the gold-purchase policy is not under discussion, I will confine myself to the silver-purchase policy.
> I can think of no individual thing that we can do that will contribute more to the already confused situation prevailing in this hemisphere than to drop the purchase of silver. The reverse of this is also true; that is, that by the continued purchase of it we will help the exchange situation, the international trade situation, and especially the relations existing in this hemisphere.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What did the Senator say Mr. Jones' business was?

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Jones in the president of and I think a large owner in the Wells-Fargo Express Co.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Where is it located?

Mr. DOWNEY. In Mexico City. He lives in the United States, but the main place of the business is Mexico.

I might say this; within the last year I myself spent some time in Mexico, and my investigation there convinced me that if we want to damage our relations with Mexico, if we want to devastate and strike a blow at Mexico, this is a well-conceived way to do it.

My distinguished colleague evidently has but little concern in what happens in the country of Mexico. Perhaps he is like many of the editorial writers who are supporting the policy of the distinguished Senator, who have said openly that we should punish Mexico, by this policy, because of their expropriation of some of the oil properties of American and British companies. That view is widely held. I cannot say that the distinguished Senator has directly supported that view, but the implication from his question as to whether I was interested in the well-being of Mexico, or some such question, leads me to believe that that is his position.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We have been buying silver from Mexico, as we have from other countries, for the past 4 years, and have been paying an exorbitant price for it, and, as has been demonstrated many times, we have no use for it. We are taking something for which we have no use, and we are sending the Mexicans our goods in return. And at the same time that we were trying to build up the good-neighbor policy, Mexico has been confiscating our property. That is my position.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, in the course of the debate I do not desire to be led into a discussion of the controversies between the Standard Oil Co. and the Shell Co., and the Government and people of Mexico. So far as I am concerned, my sympathies are with the Mexican people and their Government. That does not mean very much, because sympathies may easily go astray, but I will say that my investigation of the oil situation, talking with the leaders on both sides, convinces me that there are two sides to that question, and has also led me to believe that the Mexican people at least are very fervently of the belief that their side is the right side, which, of course, is not conclusive, but does indicate that if we desire to breed ill will and animosity, south of the Rio Grande, this is an excellent way to do it.

I hope the people of the United States and Mexico may establish the friendliest relations and in harmonious cooperation pass happily through the chaotic years that lie ahead.

I very much admire President Cardenas. I believe he has been a leader of devoted ability and enlightened statesmanship and that he and his fellow citizens will fairly meet us on any just plan looking to friendlier relations.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator feel that the proposal submitted to Mexico by the Secretary of State to arbitrate all these issues—not only the oil issue, but the issue growing out of the confiscation of lands owned by Americans there as well—does the Senator feel that that is a fair and just way of settling the question?

Mr. DOWNEY. I may say to the distinguished Senator that I do not believe I could with propriety answer that question at this time, and it would require a fuller understanding on my part of the present conditions surrounding the oil industry in Mexico. Let me say to the distinguished Senator from Delaware that I am anxious to see the most neighborly and friendly relations with Mexico that are possible, and it has been my experience in life that kindliness and fairness and forbearance are the best bases on which to work out just settlements, and I may add that the kind and exalted conduct of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] clearly indicates that he entertains the same philosophy. Does the Senator, then, mean that by doing injury to Mexico by this kind of a bill we will further the solution of this unhappy controversy between our citizens and Mexico? My experience in life does not lead me to believe so. If to me were committed the problem of defining the relations between our country and Mexico, with the ultimate objective of working out the differences between the two nations, as the very first step I would endeavor to assist Mexico, rather than damage her.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does not the Senator think that has been attempted by the State Department and by our representatives in Mexico? Does not the Senator think they have sought in every way to satisfy Mexico? And now, inasmuch as they have not found a way to do it, they are asking that the Mexicans arbitrate. Does not the Senator think that is a reasonable request?

Mr. DOWNEY. I have already indicated to the Senator that I do not at this time care to attempt to answer that question. The query was made by our Secretary of State; it is now an international subject, and I have no desire to transgress upon that particular controversy at this time. But I should like to ask the distinguished Senator for one moment to do this with me, let us just travel back along the course of American progress for one century.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Very well; I will go with the Senator.

Mr. DOWNEY. Let us go back to that unhappy period when American nationals and the American Government, by brutal, corrupt, and avaricious methods, provoked the Mexican people and the Mexican Government, and finally, with our armies resting in the city of Mexico, without right or justification, we took from Mexico over one-half of its area, and far more than one-half in value.

I know it is much easier for us to discuss the misdoings and the misconduct of other nations than to accept the blame for our own, but I say, Mr. President, that the American people still owe to the people of Mexico a great moral debt we have never paid. Coming from the State of California, which was one of the Territories gained by our conquest of Mexico, I have no desire to enlarge upon this particular phase of our history, but I do say that we still owe an obligation to our southern neighbor that I hope we may soon begin to pay.

The distinguished Senator has indicated by remarks here that he feels that the lapse of a century of time might raise the defense of the statute of limitations. I reply however long one may delay the payment of a debt it still remains due and its liquidation the wisest policy.

We are entering a chaotic decade in this world of hate and passion. I have no fear of any assault upon the Western Hemisphere by Germany, Japan, or Russia. I know that we have the men and the resources with which to defend ourselves, and that the distances are so great that we cannot be successfully attacked. But I do say the most important thing for us to do is to maintain neighborly relations in the Western Hemisphere, and I can think of no better way of maintaining neighborly relations south of the Rio Grande than by fair and generous action.

As I have already stated, we are spending three and a half billion dollars for gold, 80 percent of which comes from outside the Western Hemisphere. We are spending about 2 percent of that amount for silver, nearly all of which comes from the Western Hemisphere, and the greater part of that from Mexico. The only substantial effect of the enactment of the pending bill will be to injure China and Mexico. It would leave our great monetary problem untouched; just to the extent that 70,000,000 has a ratio of 3,500,000,000, that is 2 to 100.

Mr. President, in the coming years the boundary line between Canada and the United States, on both sides of which are fidelity and friendship, would be one of the greatest assets the American people could have. Equal to that would be the same kind of a boundary line between Mexico and the United States, and the same kind of relationship of esteem and confidence.

I repeat, we owe a tremendous debt to the Mexican Government and to the Mexican people, and I for one am unwilling to vote for a partial solution of our monetary problem which to no appreciable degree would help to solve that problem, but would be a devastating blow at a neighbor to the south of us, a smaller country whose good helper we should be, and whose friendship and fidelity we may earnestly desire and need in the coming years.

I know that very often this type of argument does not fall very well upon the ears of public leaders. When a Versailles treaty is made or a war settlement is reached it is easy to be harsh, but the day of reckoning generally comes. So, as far as I am concerned, I would rather have the friendship and the fidelity and the neighborly affection of the people of Mexico than a great flotilla of warships or armadas of airplanes. I know of no way, at this time, of more greatly injuring the hope for that sort of relationship than the enactment of this particular bill. I am, therefore, in opposition to it and will cast my vote against it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

PROMISES AND THE FOREIGN SILVER PROGRAM

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], in his speech on silver, took exception to the statement in Senate Report No. 1332, that the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 has failed to achieve the objects which its sponsors promised. He objected, in particular, to some of the promises cited in quotation marks in point 6 of the report. He expressed doubt that such promises had ever been made in connection with advocacy of silver buying. I am not surprised that those arguments now appear unbelievable to the Senator. They were fantastic. They are fantastic. Yet they were made.

The argument about the maldistribution of gold, to which the Utah Senator referred, is to be found strewn liberally through the hearings held on silver in the early 1930's. See, for example, the House Coinage Committee's hearings, The Effect of Low Silver, dated 1932. Or see the various pamphlets on silver published about the same time by Mr. F. H. Brownell, of the American Smelting & Refining Co. In the Coinage Committee's printed hearings for 1932 (72d Cong., 1st sess., hearings before the House Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures on H. Res. 72, The Effects of Low Silver), there is published as an appendix a statement entitled "The Study of Silver." In this statement a special section is devoted to the subtopic, Relation of silver to maldistribution and hoarding.

Then there was the promise—now rightly derided by the Senator from Utah—that buying silver would cause tariff restrictions to vanish. That argument was not invented for the sake of Senate Report No. 1332. It was an argument actually used in the silver campaign. It was made by no less distinguished a person than the late Speaker of the House, Hon. Henry T. Rainey. (See For Silver Money, Paris, September, 1934.)

Another promise made by advocates of the Silver Purchase Act was that it would bring prosperity to China and the China trade. Senate Report No. 1332 quotes such a promise as follows: "enabling China to 'buy our bathtubs, our shoes, and our shirts'." The Senator from Utah expressed doubt that such a fantastic argument was ever used in connection with silver. He thinks it must have been used in connection with some other subject. But no; he is mistaken. It was used in connection with silver in a hearing on the subject before the House Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, by a witness introduced by the committee chairman as one of America's best authorities on finance, and one whose great public influence in bringing about the enactment of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 is a matter of public record. I refer to the Reverend Charles E. Coughlin, of Royal Oak, Mich. For the exact quotation, I refer the Senator from Utah to the Coinage Committee's printed hearings for January 15, 1934, page 63. In the hearings (73d Cong., 2d sess., House Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, Gold Reserve Act, H. R. 6976, pp. 63–64), the witness testified:

> Now, that is one point to bear in mind, India and China cannot buy our bathtubs, our shoes, our shirts, our wheat, our automobiles, and our copper pipe, because if they attempted to do so, instead of paying one dollar for wheat, India would be obligated to pay four in their money; they cannot afford to trade with us.

Mr. President, for the information of Senators on the subject of just what was promised by the advocates of silver buying prior to the enactment of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, I send to the desk a memorandum entitled "Contentions of Silver Advocates Prior to Passage of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934," by Herbert M. Bratter, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONTENTIONS OF SILVER ADVOCATES PRIOR TO PASSAGE OF THE SILVER PURCHASE ACT OF 1934

(By Herbert M. Bratter)

Below are briefly analyzed the principal arguments employed by advocates of silver prior to passage of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934. Not a few of these arguments and contentions, it may be observed, were the same as were used in this country in the 1880's and 1890's, when silver was not so generally rejected as was the case in the early 1930's.[1]

The arguments are here examined from an objective and nonsectional viewpoint. The writer's criterion is simply the greatest good for the greatest number of Americans. The arguments and contentions are examined on their face value, without questioning the motives of those who conducted the campaign for silver. Yet it needs to be recorded that the more prominent protagonists of silver included not only earnest "old-fashioned bimetallists" and persons who firmly believed the depression could be cured simply by monetary measures, but also persons financially interested in the mining and smelting of silver, in the purchase and sale of silver bullion, or in the trade with silver-producing and so-called silver-using countries of the Far East. Had the public appreciated the fallacies and weaknesses of the silver arguments, no silver legislation would have been enacted in 1933 and 1934.

The arguments and contentions made for Government purchases of silver in the 1930's were centered on the existing economic depression. They covered a wide range of appeal, ranging from complicated and often highly misleading formulas on the one hand to unsupported assertions or mere appeals to emotion on the other. The latter were doubtless as effective in their own sector as were the former in theirs and, although difficult to analyze, they are nonetheless worth listing. For convenience, the principal silver arguments may be grouped as follows: (A) Arguments related to the monetary aspects of the depression and inflation; (B) arguments specifically involving bimetallism or symmetallism; (C) arguments related to stabilization of international rates of exchange; (D) arguments pertaining to the purchasing power of the Orient; and (E) appeals to sentiment or emotion.

[1] With changing circumstances the silver bloc in Congress has changed its tactics and its arguments. Its contentions in 1938 to 1940, markedly different from those of 1930–34, are not examined in this monograph.

For the history of the present silver legislation and an analysis of its effects, see Herbert M. Bratter, The Silver Episode, in the Journal of Political Economy (Chicago), October and December 1938, and testimony before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, April 19, 1939, hearings, To Repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 (76th Cong., 1st sess., pt. 1, pp. 17–62).

(A) INFLATION ARGUMENTS FOR SILVER

During every general business depression, American history teaches, demands for expansion of the currency develop. The more intense the depression the stronger are the demands that the supply of currency be expanded. Usually inflationists request paper money. But there are always some who incline to inflation by means of silver—either its full remonetization or the use of an increased amount of the metal in our monetary system. Such use of silver, they feel, will raise commodity prices and thereby help terminate the depression. As the last depression developed, the ranks of silver advocates in the mining areas were swelled by many who became convinced that there was a shortage of gold, that the "appreciation of money" was more than just a symptom of the depression, and that the solution was, therefore, simple and easy—to increase the supply of "basic money."

The shortage-of-gold theory, as exemplified by the pamphlets of Mr. Francis H. Brownell, of the American Smelting & Refining Co., gained many adherents. The quite widespread assumption that there was a shortage of gold was, to say the least, a very controversial point. In 1930 the League of Nations' gold delegation had, it is true, predicted a decline in the production of new gold. Although the prediction was so shortly to be disproved by events, it was, nonetheless, persuasively employed by some silver advocates. "Shortage of gold" became a prevalent conception, and silver was suggested as a useful substitute for the yellow metal.

The argument that the incorporation of silver in the monetary system would remedy the depression is thus essentially "monetary" in its appeal. Its error lay in assuming a nonexistent shortage of gold and in considering the cause of the economic depression to have been monetary. The preponderant opinion among economists who have studied that important question is clearly to the contrary. That the general public found the argument plausible, however, is not difficult to understand. People reasoned: "Since money is scarce, why not get the Government to increase the supply?" The inflationists of 1930 reasoned exactly as did those of 1893 and 1873; they were for silver because they sincerely believed its coinage would bring more money into being and so restore prosperity. They did not realize that the United States then held plenty of gold, nor could they foresee that we would shortly devalue the dollar and so "increase" our gold stock by 69 percent.[2]

The shortage-of-gold advocates of silver, we should further observe, made no distinction between the situation in countries practically denuded of gold and countries like the United States with plenty of gold to meet all requirements. The world's total supply of monetary gold during the depression was not smaller but actually was larger than in prosperous 1929. In the depression years the Occident's centralized gold stock was being rapidly increased, owing to the outpouring of hoarded Indian gold and to increased mine production, induced by the fall in mining costs. The use of gold in hand-to-hand circulation was diminishing. Revaluation of gold by country after country, moreover, was equivalent to a huge additional increase in the world's monetary stocks of the metal. Indian gold dehoarded from 1931 to 1933 alone amounted to over $1,000,000,000. Revaluation, moreover, was certain to stimulate the production of new gold throughout the world.

Apart from these changes, if the stock of gold was obviously sufficient to support a high price structure prior to 1930, it was certainly large enough—even without the new additions mentioned—to support the sadly deflated structure of 1930 and subsequent years, when prices were so much lower and the volume of business so much smaller. (Early in 1933, when the silver campaign was in full swing, the United States' stock of currency was 30 percent greater than in 1929, while the physical volume of trade was 48 percent smaller.[3] We were doing only 52 percent as much business as in 1929, and this at prices 30 percent lower, but with 30 percent more currency outstanding.) It follows that our gold stock was more than adequate for our needs, and offered ample basis for monetary and credit expansion whenever the growth of business should require it. It was therefore quite erroneous to argue for currency expansion on the grounds of insufficient monetary reserves. Reduction of media of exchange in circulation does not mean "shortage" of ways to utilize the existing monetary reserves more efficiently.

The expression "maldistribution of gold" is frequently encountered in prosilver literature of the early 1930's. It refers to the concentration of a large proportion of the world's stocks of the yellow metal in the United States, France, etc. This disproportionate accumulation was in large measure attributable to the economic disequilibrium of the times and so was a symptom of the depression, not its cause. There were, it is quite true, various countries which economic forces had denuded of their monetary stock of gold; but these countries were not silver-holding countries, and the argument that silver would be a substitute for gold was certainly of little interest to them. Remonetization of silver could not help such countries, since they neither possessed stocks of silver nor any means to acquire it. To buy silver abroad they would have found as difficult as to reacquire gold. For either purpose they lacked the necessary foreign-exchange resources. Such resources are built up only by a so-called favorable or export balance of trade, visible and invisible. The argument that United

[2] While the silver agitation was attaining its maximum pitch, under the stimulus of the broadcasts of the Reverend Father Coughlin, but prior to passage of the silver-purchase bill, gold was revalued by authority of the act of January 30, 1934.

[3] Hoarding of currency and velocity of circulation should also be taken into account.

States Treasury purchases of silver would serve to remedy such a shortage of gold in the Occident was quite mistaken, as has since been demonstrated.[4] Nor was it demonstrable that the exchange of American gold for foreign silver would be in the best interests of the United States. Yet many Americans must have been convinced by the shortage-of-gold argument for silver.

The inflation theory that the issuance of silver currency would supply an otherwise unsatisfied demand for money appealed to many who did not realize that our currency and credit system was already such that it could automatically expand whenever the growth of business activity demanded. So long as businessmen could offer satisfactory security they could readily borrow from the banks, and such borrowings were always convertible upon demand into currency, if so desired.

It is of course a mistake to think of bank notes and coin as constituting our only circulating medium, and to overlook the part played by checking deposits.

Up to a certain point, determined by the demand for currency, the issuance of silver serves no useful purpose at all, being in fact a needless expense because other and much cheaper forms of currency are available. Beyond the "saturation" point, however, the issuance of silver would be inflationary, or at least destructive of confidence, and, therefore, dangerous. In any case, if inflation of the currency be regarded as something desirable, there are much cheaper ways of accomplishing it than through the needless purchase of silver and issuance thereagainst of silver certificates.

Unless done to excess, the issuance of nonretirable silver certificates does not result in expanding the total currency in circulation, but merely in substituting a rigid element for a flexible element in our currency. If currency inflation be regarded as desirable, it may be achieved by revaluing gold more quickly than by purchasing silver.

A typical silver-as-inflation appeal in the early 1930's was the assertion: "Remonetization of silver will, at no cost, relieve the taxpayer of part of his burden."[5] Space does not permit examination here of the evils of inflation. Suffice it to observe that inflation is an invisible tax collector. By reducing the value of money, it taxes everyone who depends upon a fixed money income and in time that means that practically everyone is adversely affected. The taxpayer, therefore, is not aided by silver inflation. Silver producers are the ones helped, and the benefit to them comes not out of the thin air but from the pockets of the rest of the people. This fact is inescapable. If the silver acquired is foreign metal, American exporters of merchandise will tend to benefit as the foreign silver sellers dispose of their dollar balances here, buying our goods or services. But the benefit to the American merchandise exporter, like that to the American silver miner, can be gained only at the expense of the Nation as a whole.

A different type of argument connecting silver with the depression runs as follows: "Silver is a key commodity; by raising its price we will lift the whole commodity price level." This viewpoint was quite widely disseminated, particularly through the influential Coinage Committee hearings in 1932. Although it was not supported by the facts, many were persuaded of its force. The statement is still encountered from time to time, despite the demonstration of its invalidity afforded by events subsequent to initiation of our heavy silver-purchase program.[6] Witness, for example, the following typical version of it as presented to the Senate on May 2, 1935, by Senator ELMER THOMAS, of Oklahoma: "When silver was selling at 81 cents an ounce, wheat was selling at $1.02 a bushel. Last year wheat was selling at 95 or 96 cents a bushel. That explains the situation." Mr. René Léon, during the abovementioned hearings, pointed out that rises (or declines) in wholesale commodity prices in the United States were frequently preceded by rises (or declines) in the price of silver. Because the one had preceded the other, Mr. Léon reasoned, it must have caused the other: Post hoc, ergo propter hoc. Actually, this type of reasoning is quite fallacious. The reason the price of silver tended to anticipate general commodity price movements was simply that silver was a very sensitive commodity. Enjoying an international market traded in by banks and speculators, and performing in China the functions of an international exchange medium, silver naturally reflected the course of economic conditions more rapidly than could an unwieldy index based upon nearly 800 varied and often highly sluggish commodity prices. To the uninitiate, the charts Mr. Léon displayed before the committee and published in its hearings must have seemed convincing. The fact is that silver was, and still remains, an insignificant commodity, both in the world as a whole and in the United States, which is the world's second largest silver-producing country.[7] The burden of evidence is very much against the contention that silver is a key commodity.

Speculative commodities like silver, wheat, cotton, etc., often display temporary sympathetic action in the direction (not necessarily in the degree) of their day-to-day movements, especially during times of inflation agitation. But, more often, special circumstances govern even the temporary movements of sensitive, speculative commodities. The above-mentioned reference to the increase of the price of silver from an average of about 44 cents in January 1934 to 70 cents at the time of the Senator's speech (and to 81 cents during the interval) was due to speculation and to United States Government purchases of the metal. The much more moderate percentage change in the price of wheat cited by the Senator was due chiefly to factors directly affecting the agricultural situation, and had no connection with silver beyond possibly a momentary speculative affinity.

From the foregoing type of prosilver assertion it is only a step to such sweeping statements as "Restoration of silver will end the depression," or "Failure to improve the value of silver by remonetization may jeopardize and possibly wreck our civilization in the not remote future,"[8] or "Remonetization of silver would result in buoyant markets everywhere; it is a world-wide specific for the ills which have befallen all nations."[9]

There was, however, no evidence at all that the promised results would follow remonetization of silver, whether on a national or international scale, unless "buoyant markets" means the disturbing speculative adjustment to new conditions. Certainly, the effects of America's silver-purchase program since 1933 have thus far failed to even mildly substantiate the second part of the above assertion.

Other panacea arguments for silver include the following: "Recognize silver and tariff restrictions will vanish."[10] It is difficult to conceive of any basis for this claim, for there is hardly any remote connection between silver and the tariff question, unless it lie in the congressional arena, where, at one time during the last century, there existed a close liaison of the logrolling type between the spokesman for silver and the tariff.[11] The panacea idea also characterizes the Bimetallic Association's claim that "the people's purchasing power can be restored only by restoring silver to its usefulness as money."[12] To suggest that prices can be raised only through the costly and cumbersome silver acquisitions is quite unconvincing to thoughtful persons. This argument, like many others, oversimplified the causes of the depression. Not merely was silver not a major cause of our depression; it had hardly the remotest causal connection with it. In any case, with the depreciation of the dollar in 1933 and January 1934, any vestige of excuse for inflation via silver had been removed prior to the passage of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934.

Insofar as the various arguments cited above are related to the economic depression they hold forth the supposed prospect of simultaneous benefit to the country as a whole by way of the currency. Another line of appeal for the use of silver in terminating the depression was focused upon the economic status of silver producers and holders of silver here and abroad. Two examples of this line of reasoning may be selected:

"Higher silver will stimulate business in the Western States, and so restore prosperity to the country"; and "To reestablish entire confidence in silver would increase the purchasing power of vast numbers of its holders."[13] The first of these arguments is easily dissipated by an examination of the pertinent statistics. The statistics show that silver is too unimportant an item in the national welfare. Even within the seven States which produce nearly all our silver, the mining of that metal yields only a fraction of their income. The products of their farms and forests are much more important. Silver in 1933 constituted less than 7 percent of the value of those States' mineral production and was equivalent to less than 3 percent of the value of their farm income.

In the eight States which produced over 96 percent of this country's silver in 1937, silver accounted for only 1.6 percent as much income as did other minerals and farm products. Of total accountable income received by these eight States in 1937, silver—valued at the subsidy price of over 77 cents—comprised only 0.62 of 1 percent, and in no one of the eight States was it as much as 7 percent of the total income.

Let us now examine the second of the two arguments just quoted. If confidence in silver were reestablished among nonholders of the metal, the statement would be true, for then the holders of silver could sell it to others and the purchasing power of the former would thereby be augmented. Unfortunately there is no way of artificially reestablishing confidence in silver on the part of nonholders (other than the American Government) and of thereby increasing the purchasing power of the silver holders. Even if it were possible to do so, a question naturally suggests itself, namely: If the purchasing power of silver holders is increased without their having created an equivalent amount of new wealth, is it not true that their gain in purchasing power is at the expense of those who will have taken over their silver at an artificial price? And if this be the case, what interest have nonholders of silver in transferring purchasing power from themselves to silver holders?

(B) ARGUMENTS FOR BIMETALLISM AND SYMMETALLISM

The foregoing discussion has dealt with the implications of various arguments urging increased monetary use of silver, but without fixing the price of silver in terms of gold. Let us not consider the suggestions that bimetallism be adopted either by this country alone (national bimetallism) or by international agreement (international bimetallism). Among the characteristics of bimetallism is the provision that silver may be converted by its holder into currency (free coinage) without maximum limit as to amount and on such a basis that its price, in terms of currency and of gold, does not vary. In other words, under bimetallism the government or governments concerned undertake to establish a market for silver and gold at a fixed ratio, e. g., 16 to 1. The advantage which such an arrangement would confer upon silver producers is obviously that of an unlimited market and a guaranteed price.

With reference to bimetallism, at this point it suffices to recall that the silver controversy of the 1890's centered directly on the proposal that the country return to bemetallism. The controversy reached its height in the election of 1896, and thereafter, as we have seen, died down. The revival of silver agitation in the early 1930's gave rise to arguments for the readoption of bimetallism, but in many cases, the latter were in reality just arguments for the greater employment of silver and gave no attention to the chief aspect of bimetallism, a fixed ratio between silver and gold. In other words, the expressions, "remonetization of silver" (meaning the making of silver once more a standard of value) and "restoration of silver" (which in many cases meant merely restoration of a higher price for silver) were often interchangeably used.

Prominent among the arguments made for bimetallism were statements that we should return to it "because it worked successfully during a large part of the last century"; that it "would give us a more stable standard of value"; that it offers a "safe form of inflation"; and that it "will stabilize the exchanges." [14]

The world is not without experience with the weaknesses of bimetallism. The assertion that the system worked successfully in the nineteenth century is not well founded, for we know that bimetallism broke down. Bimetallism was never in universal use. Had it been universally adopted, it still probably would have broken down, as did the gold standard in recent years.

Nineteenth century bimetallism had its chief support in France, where it was maintained for 70 years from 1803 to 1874. The changing market ratio of silver and gold characterized periods of years during which one of the two metals was moving into France, while the other metal was moving out, or vice versa. Since the world market ratio constantly fluctuated, the maintenance of a fixed ratio in a bimetallic country meant that at most times either one or the other metal was overvalued there. For example, in 12 years between 1803 and 1820, silver could be obtained for gold more cheaply within France than outside; hence gold flowed into France and silver flowed out.

Due to this factor, bimetallic countries tended to find themselves moving alternately—as the market ratios changed—toward de facto gold or silver monometallism. A good example of this was the United States itself, which legally had bimetallism from 1792 to 1873.[15] Actually, the mint ratio was for a time sufficiently out of line with the market ratio, so that gold tended to leave the country. Within a few years after the change in our mint ratio in 1834, silver became undervalued, and silver dollars disappeared from circulation.[16]

Turning from its internal to its international aspects, we find that under bimetallism the world's exchanges were not stable. The alternate fluctuation in silver and gold production, always present, as well as other factors affecting their relative values, would make it difficult successfully to operate bimetallism today, just as they made it difficult in the last century. There is no "scientific" lasting ratio between silver and gold which would hold for long. The selection of any fixed ratio would of necessity involve an arbitrary choice.

Certain general objections to the large-scale use of silver in the monetary reserves apply also to bimetallism. The bulkiness of silver compared to gold renders it unsuitable for hand-to-hand circulation in other than fractional denominations, as American experience with the standard silver dollar has proved. Silver's bulkiness is equally an obstacle in its use in bank reserves or for the settlement of international balances. Since the metal today is not acceptable for such purpose in leading countries, true international bimetallism is unattainable. In the light of this well-established fact, for a single country to undertake national bimetallism would be merely to undertake an unprofitable philanthropy for the benefit of silver producers and holders, without even the hope of success. Were international bimetallism temporarily achievable, it would nonetheless break down with every major disturbance in the relative international distribution of monetary silver and gold. The causes of the break-down of the gold standard similarly would have worked to cause the break-down of bimetallism.

Rightly or wrongly, moreover, the public generally places no confidence in bimetallism. This is sufficient reason for our not turning to it.

Another objection to bimetallism which developed in the international monetary conferences of the last century, is that bimetallism in reality sets up simultaneously two standards of value. To attempt to use two variables as interchangeable standards of value is contrary to logic.

The belief that bimetallism would eliminate exchange confusion and instability was held in various quarters. Thus: "To remove the present exchange confusion requires a metallic, international unit of value; this, bimetallism will supply." Obviously, the gold standard offers a "metallic, international unit of value" just as much as does bimetallism. For bimetallism to work satisfactorily, it would be necessary for all nations to have a sufficient supply of both gold and silver to see them through the downswings of the business cycle and adverse balances of trade. Furthermore, it would be necessary for all countries to follow uniform practices with regard to money and credit, since marked differences in the use of the gold and silver would tend to break down an international bimetallic system. For example, the supply of United States dollars of all kinds (currency, bullion, and bank deposits) is considerably larger than our supply of gold. Normally, our internal monetary and credit policies exert a tremendous influence on the commodity value of gold the world over. In other words, gold is only the "tail," and the dollar is the "dog."

As we have had adequate occasion to note in recent years, the exchange instability that drives currencies off a metallic base has its roots in maladjustments of balances of international payments. These maladjustments are the result, for example, of over-expansion of production of given commodities, of wars, or of arbitrary political action illustrated by bilateral trade agreements, import quotas, exchange control, and similar evidences of nationalism. Clearly such basic instability would not have been avoided and would not be remedied by a resort to bimetallism or to any other monetary standard. Even if the nations possessed an adequate supply of silver and gold in adequate proportions, in the face of the nationalism which now characterizes the world it would be impossible to get them to agree to stabilize the exchanges on the basis of bimetallism, the gold standard, or any other rigid system. But, they do not today possess the necessary silver and gold. With the best will in the world, to establish bimetallism now would require redistribution of the world's stocks of silver and gold. Who would finance such redistribution?

There was also the argument that bimetallism would offer us a more stable standard of value for internal purposes. It was argued that if we use two metals in fixed ratio instead of one, the risk of fluctuations in their joint value is less than in the case of one metal; that if one of the metals appreciates in value there is at least the chance of compensation in the movement of the other.

That "two commodities are more stable than one" is not self-evident with reference to gold plus silver. In any event, cannot the end sought be approached by other means than the use of silver? The instability of the value of gold is universally admitted. But it remains to be demonstrated that silver is less unstable than gold. If we adopted bimetallism or symmetallism the new monetary demand for silver might eventually result in greater stability in the value of silver than now obtains. In such a case the stability would result from the adoption of bimetallism or symmetallism. This is not the same as the argument that we should incorporate silver in our monetary system because it will bring an added element of stability. Between 1890 and 1931, when admittedly the leading countries were completing the establishment of the gold standard and the abandonment of the silver standard, the purchasing power of silver in terms of other commodities (not the price of silver in terms of gold), declined without major interruption.[17] This decline was in part due to the abandonment of silver. Had silver not been so abandoned as a monetary metal, its value would have been less unstable during the period referred to. But the facts being what they were, silver from 1890 to 1931 was a less stable metal than gold. If gold be not an ideal standard of value, there is no evidence to show that silver is a better one, in which case there is nothing to be gained by adding silver to our gold reserves. As a reserve material gold is much better than silver. To illustrate the preference for gold, during our banking crisis of 1932–33 the people hoarded gold, not silver. In settling international balances, gold, not silver, is the metal creditors want.

To add to our monetary reserves a cumbersome metal, difficult to dispose of, and especially to acquire it at a cost far in excess of its realizable value, is simple waste. It is unfortunate that we embarked upon precisely such a wasteful process.

[15] In fact, however, from 1814 to 1817, and again from 1862 through 1878, the United States was on a fiduciary standard.

[16] The premium on gold was not sufficient during most of the period following 1834 to warrant the melting or exporting of fractional silver coins.

[17] See charts in Herbert M. Bratter, Silver Market Dictionary, pp. 115–116, or The Silver Market (U. S. Department of Commerce, T. P. S. 139), p. 29. In 1890 the price of silver adjusted to the wholesale price level of the United States was equivalent to $1.87 per ounce; in 1931 it was equivalent to less than 41 cents. There are very good reasons to suppose that the value of silver would have declined further in the period following 1931 had not the agitation to do something for silver become marked.

There is reason to believe that some members of the Roosevelt administration favored the London silver agreement and the Silver Purchase Act mainly because they felt that the stability-of-silver argument had weight. Thus Prof. George F. Warren, a prominent member of the President's "brain trust," subscribed to this view in 1933 when he asserted:

"By adopting bimetallism or symmetallism it is possible to set any price level that is desired. If silver is remonetized, it should certainly be done by symmetallism, as proposed by the great English economist, Alfred Marshall. This proposal is now receiving considerable attention in England. It is very simple. Instead of having a dollar exchange for 23.22 grains of gold, it would exchange for some given weight of gold plus a given weight of silver. Since two commodities are more stable than one, and since silver production is less erratic than gold production, such a money would be more stable than gold. If once established, it would work in the same way in which the gold standard works, except for greater stability." [18]

The "considerable attention" being received by the subject of symmetallism in England was definitely not of any influence in the formulation of Great Britain's monetary policies.

We have noted the arguments that bimetallism is a "safe" form of inflation because it is not capable of indefinite expansion and an "honest" form of inflation because it has value behind it. As to this claim, any inflation tends to weaken confidence in the currency and hence is not "safe." [19] If, at the other extreme, it is intended that we should limit the volume of money rigidly to the amount of gold and silver on hand, it should be observed that we would be introducing an element of weakness through sacrificing elasticity. Since we had been experimenting with inflation on a huge scale and had revalued our gold stock by almost 70 percent, it was certainly unnecessary to turn to silver in 1934.

It was perhaps not without significance that all the proposals of the early 1930's to establish bimetallism suggested a ratio of silver to gold far out of line with the then existing market price of silver. All such suggestions would have raised the price and the purchasing power of silver. It is very apparent that the more persistent advocates of bimetallism in the years mentioned were men whose personal or political fortunes directly or indirectly benefited as the price of silver should be improved and as the market for silver should be broadened. This is not to imply that there were not also sincere bimetallists with no financial or political interest in silver. But it is very interesting to observe that, following passage of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, very little further demand for bimetallism was heard. It seems safe to conclude that the demands for remonetization of silver at some artificially high ratio were mostly demands for a redistribution of wealth not obviously in the general public interest—a distribution from the general public to silver holders and producers.

(C) ARGUMENTS RELATED TO EXCHANGE STABILIZATION

Distinct from the specific subject of bimetallism and exchange stability was the argument that any large silver-purchase program would make for exchange stability. Some based their reasoning on the statement that our purchasing of foreign silver would serve to redistribute a large part of the world's gold reserves. Others curiously reasoned that our acquisition of a large stock of silver, as well as (not instead of) gold, would enable us to dictate the terms of currency stabilization.

The gold-distribution argument referred to apparently assumed that we ought to redistribute our stock of gold, regardless of the cost to ourselves. It was very effectively used in the silver campaign, and even later it was sometimes offered as justification for our silver purchases.[20] We could exchange gold for more useful things than silver by reducing import tariffs. Actually, despite our large silver purchases, the gold stock of the country has increased greatly. If we grant that, with silver not a standard of value here, American silver purchases tend to keep out gold which would otherwise enter the country, it follows that, in so doing, they tend to interfere with an automatic broadening of the monetary base—an effect just the opposite of the inflationary influences which many persons sought in the purchase of silver.

The suggestion that by denuding the world of a large part of its silver and gold we could force currency stabilization on our own terms was a curious one. It would have been much more logical to argue that our accumulation of the two metals would merely more solidify the already widespread managed-currency movement abroad. The influence of our silver purchases in China's adoption of a managed currency is apropos of this point. That our possession of a vast hoard of silver could ever wean Great Britain or France from their disinterest in the white metal or could encourage them to stabilize when they were unwilling was a hope foredoomed to disappointment.

Nonetheless, there are some who have described our silver policy as a club over the head of the British. Senator THOMAS of Oklahoma, for example, was quoted as urging us to "line up Mexico, Canada, and the South American silver countries, etc., * * * we could lend those countries gold or silver, fix up a stabilization arrangement, and then Great Britain would have to come our way." In support of the club-over-Britain argument it was held that: (a) The buying of foreign silver makes for depreciation of the dollar in terms of sterling and appreciation of the pound vis-à-vis the dollar; (b) through the "ruppee ratio" our silver program might yet bring Britain to do our bidding in the matter of currency stabilization; (c) an alternative variation of this argument was that our ability to let the price of silver drop was a weapon against Britain.

As to (a), unless the silver purchased abroad is purchased from a country in the sterling area, the argument certainly does not apply. Even where silver is purchased in the sterling area, the argument does not entirely apply unless the silver is a product of the sterling area. To illustrate, if we buy Mexican or Chinese silver in London, even though such silver has been held in London for some time, our action in part simply counterbalances the effects which the previous British purchase of that silver had on British exchange. Only to the extent of the British profit, if any, on the silver concerned, does the British exchange rate benefit from our purchase of that silver. The idea that, through our silver purchases, we could force an appreciation of the pound was indeed naive. One need only reflect that any country can, with the greatest of ease, depreciate its currency at will.

The unreality of argument (b) has been examined elsewhere.[20a] Here we need merely note that, excepting in the Anglo-Indian trade, the rupee exchange ratio is not a really vital matter to the British. To them the rupee is distinctly a very subordinate matter when compared to the pound sterling itself.

The suggestion (c) that our Treasury's opposite policy of December 1935, a policy of letting silver decline sharply in price, was another club over Britain's head was equally unrealistic. It is hard to conceive that anyone should have believed that a decline in the price of silver would cause the British to do our bidding in the matter of international currency stabilization.

(D) PURCHASING-POWER-OF-THE-ORIENT ARGUMENT

The arguments to the effect that our export trade would greatly benefit by increasing the price of silver played a most important role in building up sentiment favorable to the passage of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934. "Raise the price of silver, which is the Orient's only standard of value," we were told, "and thereby increase proportionately the purchasing power of hundreds of millions of people in the Far East." The argument took various forms, often including not only silver-standard China and Hong Kong and sterling-exchange-standard India but also South America, Australia, Mexico—erroneously presumed to be on the silver standard—"half the world," "three-quarters of the world," and even "four-fifths of the world's population." [21]

Another example is the following, quoted from a long letter from the secretary of the Bimetallic Association of Denver to the editor of the New York Times (published October 22, 1933):

"I am among the financially illiterate who want to know why the purchasing power of the Chinese has not been cut into less than one-third when we say their ounce of silver is worth 38 cents in our money, although our dollar, with less than 1 ounce in it, is worth 100 cents. I have been talking with Chinese merchants who know quite a lot about Chinese purchasing power. Many small articles that sold for 10 to 50 cents manufactured here were very popular with them, but they could not and would not pay 50 cents to $2 for them, silver being under 30 cents at the time of the talk."

Copious additional versions of the purchasing-power-of-the-Orient argument for raising the price of silver may be found in the speeches, articles, etc., of Senators Borah, Thomas, Wheeler, and Pittman, of Father Coughlin, René Léon, Raymond Moley, Sir Henri Deterding, and high administration spokesmen both in the Hoover and Roosevelt administrations.

Some of the same men who vigorously urged the above argument later urged us to raise the price of silver for a different reason; namely to prevent the development of oriental manufacturing industries. (See, e. g., Senator WHEELER in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 27, 1934.) Both this and the main argument here under consideration, be it noted, were designed to enlist support of the export trade in the cause of silver.

It was, of course, true that the quotation of the currency of a silver-standard country—although not necessarily its purchasing power—increased when the price of silved increased. Accordingly, many persons interested in the trade with Asia, Mexico, etc., as well as others who favored any action which would stimulate international trade, were convinced by the apparent merit of the reasoning quoted above.

[18] From Professor Warren's paper, Stabilization of the Measure of Value, published by the Committee for the Nation.

[19] This and following objections, it goes without saying, are as much objections to silver expansion in any form as objections to bimetallism specifically.

[20] For example, one commentator was quoted as saying that the silver program is "virtually the only current means available for shoving into world trade part of the massive gold hoard of this country" (The New York Times, December 25, 1935). A different statement of the same argument is given in Handy & Harman's Twentieth Annual Review of the Silver Market.

[20a] Hearings, To Repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, op. cit., pp. 56–57.

[21] A good example of this argument is to be found in Senator BURTON K. WHEELER's radio address of December 28, 1932 (S. Doc. No. 158, 72d Cong., 2d sess.). Silver remonetization would "quadruple the purchasing power of untold millions of people * * * of the Orient, Russia, and South America." (Where the arguments referred to "the Orient" we may conservatively read "China.") The Reverend Charles E. Coughlin's radio address of December 3, 1933, contains the assertion that "four-fifths of the world's population [is] now using silver as its medium of exchange."

The most conspicuous error in statements identifying oriental purchasing power with the fortunes of silver was, of course, the inclusion of India, Mexico, South America, Australia, and New Zealand, etc., in the category of silver-standard countries whose currency would rise in keeping with a rise in the price of silver. The fact was that for many years the silver standard had not existed in Mexico, India, Australia, South America, etc. In 1929 and 1930, when this argument for silver made its appearance, only China, Hong Kong, and a very few countries of lesser importance maintained their currencies on a silver basis.[22] Strictly speaking, the argument here under analysis should be viewed only in relation to silver-standard countries. Since with the deepening of the depression various minor countries discontinued the silver standard (Siam, French Indochina, Persia), the area to which the argument supposedly applied was being definitely narrowed. Today, for example, there remains no silver-standard nation anywhere in the world, China and Hong Kong having adopted the policy of controlling exchange rates. It is therefore obvious that the sweeping area claimed for this argument for silver was very misleading to the uninformed. The argument, moreover, greatly overestimated the practical potentialities of the Orient in international trade.

A further error was the reasoning that an increase in the purchasing power of a silver-standard country was produced merely by increasing the foreign-exchange value of its currency. For example, consider the argument as it applied to silver-standard China prior to October 1934. For generations the Chinese (as also the Indians) had bought silver out of their savings. The silver had had to come from abroad, and—but for exceptional years of depression—China was long a net importer of silver. The ability of the Chinese to import silver depended upon their ability to sell goods and services abroad. If they sold more goods, their overseas balances (purchasing power) improved, and with it their ability to buy silver improved. By and large, they bought silver regardless of its price, and—so important a factor in the silver market was the demand from the Chinese—it is safe to say that the world price of silver depended in very large measure on "the purchasing power of the Orient," the very opposite of the claim made by American silver producers.

The depression hit China heavily and reduced its purchasing power, so that China was converted from a net importer of silver to a net exporter, but that does not in the least affect the validity of the facts just presented.

Silver advocates should have differentiated between the oversea purchasing power of the Chinese people and the purchasing power of the Chinese monetary unit, the silver yuan. The latter was merely the medium of exchange. It served as a unit of account and did not affect the oversea purchasing power of the Chinese unless and until it was physically taken out of circulation and sold abroad. In the latter event it did add to the purchasing power of the Chinese. But to argue that merely changing the value of the unit in which a country's international business is measured is to increase the quantum of that country's trade was completely misleading. One might as logically have argued that by increasing the size of ore cars we would proportionately increase the output of our mines. Raising the price of silver did increase the value of the yuan, but as a result silver flowed out of China. So difficult did the situation become that China suspended the silver standard in October 1934, and formally abandoned it in November 1935.[23]

Because of China's adverse international trade balances from 1932 to 1935, inclusive, she would have had to export large quantities of silver regardless of the Silver Purchase Act and it is not altogether impossible that this outward flow of metal would in any case have forced China to abandon the silver standard. From this aspect, the Silver Purchase Act may have been far more helpful to China than that country has admitted, by providing a buyer for silver which she might otherwise have had to dump at lower prices, and by thus facilitating her abandonment of the silver standard. This effect, however, was very different from what the sponsors of the Silver Purchase Act promised.

If we regard the American silver purchases as having a stimulating effect on China's imports and on America's exports to China, it should be noted that this involves the transfer of wealth and purchasing power from the United States to China in exchange for a metal that is of no use to us. It is pertinent to ask ourselves whether this is desirable from our own general viewpoint. For one thing, the increased Chinese purchasing power is not earmarked for expenditure in the United States, but may be used in importing goods from Germany, Japan, Great Britain, or any other country. While the purchase of Chinese silver does tend to increase Chinese purchases of American exports—albeit not by increasing the exchange value of China's monetary unit, as was claimed—is the resultant exchange of American products for silver of benefit to us? The products we export to China are consumable goods—hence real wealth—whereas the overvalued silver we get in exchange and impound serves no useful purpose from our national standpoint. Are we not really giving away some of our natural wealth and labor in this process? Is not the purchase of oriental silver merely dollar depreciation under another name?

While China was on the silver standard the argument that the oversea purchasing power of that country increased when the price of silver and the exchange value of China's unit of currency increased seemed plausible because of the fact that, following such increases, a given quantity of Chinese currency would buy more than it formerly would. This was quite undeniable (so long as China maintained the silver standard); temporarily, Chinese importers of foreign goods stood to benefit. But, by the same token, an appreciating Chinese exchange rate made it progressively more difficult for foreigners to buy Chinese goods. So, while one group of Chinese tended to benefit, another group—domestic customers of the first—tended in equal measure to lose. There was thus no net gain.

Reducing the local money income of the export group cannot balance a gain of purchasing power of the import group, which therefore gradually loses its benefits.[24] Moreover, any alteration of the exchange rate, however worthy its object, always entails undesirable price and economic readjustments.[25] Workers become unemployed and must seek new ways of earning a living. During periods of such readjustment, businessmen find it difficult to plan their operations and trade slows down.

Finally, once a readjustment between the importing and exporting classes has been completed, the stimulus which the one or the other group received has worn off and there remains no net benefit, even to the favored group. It should be borne in mind that only a very small fraction of the world's foreign trade was ever accounted for by silver-standard China and "silver-using" India, etc. Of the import trade of 90 countries in 1929, less than 5½ percent was accounted for by "over half the world," represented by China, Hong Kong, India, and Ceylon. China alone accounted for less than 2½ percent of the total. In 1930–32 the share of these countries in world trade was even smaller, reflecting the falling off in Occidental demands for raw materials.[26] Even more significant, the value of foreign trade was and still is an extremely unimportant part of China's total trade: less than 3 percent of the total volume. The serious inconvenience to domestic trade caused by a disappearance of China's currency, therefore, far outweighed any possible benefits of America's silver program to China's import trade. The adverse effects on Chinese trade of the monetary stringency caused by the flow of silver to America is illustrated in scores of official reports from China. For example, the American commercial attaché in Shanghai on June 8, 1935, reported:

"Shanghai trade and industry during May felt decidedly acute effects of the monetary stringency, with the situation accentuated by bank failures. Despite the best exchange rates prevailing in the past 6 years, dealers in a considerable range of staple commodities and manufactured goods are unable to take advantage thereof, due to the shortage of cash, slowness of up-country collections, and lack of bank credit." [27]

A study of Chinese trade statistics over a period of years, both under a falling and a rising price of silver, fails to substantiate the argument that a rising exchange rate produces a net increase in Chinese imports. For example, statistics show, for 1927 to 1935, the changes in the United States exports to China, including Hong Kong and excluding Manchuria, during the periods when silver was declining (1928–32) and when it was rising in market price and purchasing power (1933–35).

In 1935, when there was an increase of 35 percent in the price of silver, and when the value of our merchandise imports from [22] The argument is really an old one, and may be found in various reports and articles, notaby in the report of the National Monetary Commission (Washington, 1910), Foreign Exchanges, statement of Mr. Morton Frewen, pp. 9–13. The report cites various American consular reports from the Far East as to the deleterious effects of a declining price of silver on Chinese commodity imports. See also Worthington C. Ford, Silver in Commerce, in The Gold-Silver Controversy, Essays from Political Science Quarterly (New York, 1896), p. 112.

[23] It seems hardly necessary to point out that what we are here considering is the effect on the purchasing power of China abroad in the light of a change in Chinese exchange rates, and not the internal effects on China of our silver-purchase program. That heavy American silver purchases would be harmful to China was predicted long before this country embarked on its silver program. See C. A. Conant, The Principles of Money and Banking, New York, 1905, p. 343. Cf. Herbert M. Bratter: The Silver Market (U. S. Department of Commerce, Trade Promotion Series No. 139), p. 55; Oriental War Raises Interest in Silver Issue in New York Herald Tribune of November 29, 1931; What the Exporter Asks About Silver, in Export Trade and Finance (New York), January 2, 1932.

[24] A certain foreign machine cost 1,000 yuan prior to the advance in the price of silver, and 666 yuan subsequently. The importer could thus afford to sell it to his customers more cheaply, sharing with them the 334 yuan profit. But, simultaneously, a quantity of Chinese export hides formerly selling in New York at $1,000 were, due to the increased exchange rate on China, raised in dollar price to $1,500.

[25] Referring to the example in the above footnote, the sellers of hides find it difficult to maintain the normal volume of their sales, unless they reduce their price. If they do this, they lower their money income. The business of the machine importer in China has been temporarily stimulated, but, owing to the shrinkage of exports, on a dwindling market. Prices begin to readjust themselves to the changed conditions.

[26] For the figures, see Commerce Reports, February 1, 1932, p. 212; April 8, 1933, p. 212.

[27] For other similar reports, see U. S. Department of Commerce, Foreign Financial News, Far Eastern Notes, passim.

China showed an increase over 1934 (i. e., an addition to China's oversea purchasing power), China's merchandise imports from us declined about 80 percent. A similar distinct absence of the claimed relationship between the price of silver and China's purchasing power as expressed in imports of American goods is evidenced by the figures for 1928, 1931, 1932, and 1933. Indeed, in 1931 and 1933 the price of silver and the value of our merchandise exports to China actually moved in opposite directions. More important than the price of silver as a clue to changes in China's purchasing power abroad are the figures of American commodity imports from China.

(It should, of course, be noted that no published statistics take account of that part of our China trade transshipped in Japan; nor is any attempt here made to adjust the statistics for lag.)

The purchasing power of the Orient, it was further argued, would benefit from an increase in the price of silver because the market value of the silver hoarded in Asia would increase proportionately.[28] It was stated that the Chinese and Indian hoarders felt poor because silver had declined. "Raise the value of their silver holdings and they will buy foreign goods."

This argument is not convincing. Unless the silver is sold, no increase in purchasing power is felt. To argue, for example, that an increase in the theoretical value of India's 4,000,000,000 ounces of silver ornaments and coin is a great boon to the country while the silver remains hoarded is very misleading. Would the reader of this, assuming that he owns a living-room chair, feel richer tomorrow if the market price of new furniture advanced? Probably not. If, perchance, our reader were contemplating the purchase of another article of furniture, the advance in price might indeed make him feel poorer. To the Indian who habitually buys and hoards silver, his purchasing power over the commodity silver is at least as important as his purchasing power over other imported commodities like typewriters or alarm clocks; and a higher price of silver may actually displease him.

Quite a different suggestion as to the connection between silver and the trade with China is contained in an argument which was given some prominence during a period when Japanese industrial competition was attracting attention. According to this argument, a higher price of silver would reduce oriental industrial competition. Of course, as already mentioned, it was erroneous to assume that the whole Orient was on a silver basis. Japan and India, the two leading industrial countries of Asia, had not been silver-standard countries for many years, and their currencies were therefore not raised in foreign-exchange value by an increase in the price of silver. Insofar as the argument had any force with reference to China, it remained to be shown how a higher price of silver could reduce Chinese industrialization. The American silver program forced China off silver. But, even if this had not occurred, the increase in the price of silver and of the yuan, to the extent that it made Chinese commodity exports more difficult, cut into China's real purchasing power abroad and so would probably have tended to force China to manufacture goods formerly imported, had China retained the silver standard.

The argument under analysis is not a new one. In 1896 Francis A. Walker,[29] the bimetallist, wrote that for several years British consuls had been reporting the industrialization of "India, Japan, and even China," which latter was manufacturing the woodwork of pianos and "even manufacturing English beer." Since Walker's day this tendency had developed greatly, and Japan had become a powerful industrial nation. Yet our trade with Japan had not declined, but increased, until that Empire constituted one of our leading customers. Industrialization of China was not necessarily an evil which America should seek to delay. Nor was it something which America could easily stop. That the steady industrial development of Shanghai had not been prevented by changes in the exchange value of China's silver currency is shown in the statistics of kilowatts of load connected to the Shanghai Power Co. system from 1901 through 1934.[30]

The arguments dealing with the purchasing power of the Orient were indeed more varied than might be supposed. There was the assertion, for example, that bimetallism "would enable us to take away Britain's trade with the Orient,"[31] a statement unsupported by any evidence; and there was the prediction that "unless the United States remonetizes silver, British and Japanese interests will soon dominate the world textile markets,"[32] an equally undemonstrated proposition.

Related to the foregoing was the argument, stressed by Mr. René Léon during the 1932 coinage committee hearings, that "restoring the price of silver will reverse the flight of capital from Orient to Occident, which occurred when the price of silver declined." Actually there was no evidence of any flight of capital of the sort mentioned.[33] Today it is pertinent to ask, rather, whether the American-induced outflow of Chinese silver was not accompanied by a flight of capital, induced by the restoring of the price of silver.

(E) APPEALS TO SENTIMENT, ETC.

Finally we come to a group of assertions, statements, contentions, and the like, which were more often appeals to sentiment than to reason. Nonetheless, such appeals, setting forth fancied merits of silver, are to be found liberally scattered in the documents of the silver campaign. They would hardly merit consideration but for the fact that they were not without their intended effect. Some typical examples are therefore quoted with brief comment below.

For instance, it has been maintained that "nature alone can be trusted with the world's money supply,"[34] an assertion which, if true, would warrant the scrapping of our entire currency and credit system. Such a proposal would surely not be seriously entertained. No more convincing is the reasoning that "there may be something to the silver arguments; therefore, they should be tried as an experiment."[35] With all our knowledge of the history of silver, and with all the evidence of competent economists, bankers, and officials against it, there was no excuse for further "experimenting" with the metal. The silver-purchase acts of 1878 and 1890 had been experiments with a disastrous end. When President Cleveland summoned the special session of 1893 to repeal the Sherman Act, he stated plainly:

"The people of the United States are entitled to a sound and stable currency and to money recognized as such on every exchange and in every market of the world. Their Government has no right to injure them by financial experiments opposed to the policy and practice of other civilized states, nor is it justified in permitting an exaggerated and unreasonable reliance on our material strength and ability to jeopardize the soundness of the people's money.

"I cannot rid myself of the belief that there lurk in the proposition for the free coinage of silver, so strongly approved and so enthusiastically advocated by a multitude of my countrymen, a serious menace to our prosperity and an insidious temptation of our people to wander from the allegiance they owe to public and private integrity."

Another argument of dubious validity was that "we should substitute sound silver for unsound paper money." Paper money may become "unsound," but there is no reason to suppose that the exigencies which drive a government to inflate would not, were there no paper money, drive it to "clip the coin." History is replete with examples of such debasement by government. (In the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 the President was actually given the power to reduce the content of the standard silver dollar.)

A long-time silver advocate stated:[36]

"It would be safer and sounder to bring about an increase in the quantity of world purchasing power in use, not by the issue of banks or by government of more paper money, the flow of which might dry up or turn into a disastrous flood, according to circumstances, but rather by the legalizing of the free minting and use of more silver money, the supply of which could not dry up (by the arbitrary decision of a central bank in London or elsewhere), nor run and drown us (by excessive issues by some reckless or bankrupt government). Moreover, silver money is already used by, and has always been popular with, a half or more of the populations of the earth."

Suffice it to observe here that an increase in purchasing power comes from an increase in the production of saleable goods and services, not of money, by the use of which transactions are merely measured. Resort to silver for paper money would be only deflationary, if we were to depend on metal exclusively for our circulatory media. The above statement confuses "standard of value" with "store of savings."

Actually, one must allow for a large degree of management of currencies in the future, and there is no reason to suppose that the restoration of silver would improve the quality of the managing.

A related and historic argument, often adduced by proponents of bimetallism in justification of a higher price for silver runs as follows: "Silver and gold are found in nature in the ratio of about 16 to 1; therefore we should restore silver to this, its natural value." The world value of silver in terms of gold is not a matter which the United States can legislatively determine. Such value depends not upon the quantities of silver and gold produced in past centuries, but upon the relative demand for and market supply of each metal. Proponents of this argument cited estimates of total silver and gold production since 1493. Examination of the intervening trends of production shows marked fluctuations. The ratio of silver production to gold production was, during the last years of the seventeenth century, over 30 to 1; 20 years later it was barely 20 to 1; at the end of the eighteenth century it was about 50 to 1; and in the middle of the nineteenth century, about 5 to 1.[37] The historic ratio of 16 to 1, which is usually urged by bimetalists, has no relationship to present-day conditions. It was recommended during the worst part of the depression, when the silver-gold ratio on the open market went above 80 to 1, and it was recommended subsequently, when the ratio was as high as 77.7 to 1,[38] notwithstanding the recent vast accumulations by the Treasury.

[38] Based on gold at $35 per ounce and silver at 45 cents.

Following passage of the Silver Purchase Act, silver advocates sometimes asserted that our own action was more significant than might be supposed, and that the example we were setting the world by our 1-to-3 silver-gold program would inspire other countries to follow suit. But this supposition was not warranted by the evidence. To date there has been not the slightest indication that our purchases of silver have increased the monetary demand for that metal in other countries. Outside of the United States, silver as a standard of value is more than ever a dead metal. It will take more than United States Treasury demand to cause foreign monetary authorities to esteem silver. Instead, the manner of the Treasury's purchases in 1934 and 1935 served only to increase foreign uncertainty and distrust in the metal, and perhaps to delay any prospect of international currency stabilization. This country can never legislate silver back into its pristine esteem abroad.

A rather vague characterization by one of its authors has described the present silver program as "designed to balance our domestic currency.[39] Alternate versions of this statement were that the program "is designed to restore the monetary price of silver to parity with the gold which circulates in the United States," and "our silver program is designed to restore silver to parity in an orderly manner throughout the world and to stabilize it at such parity." [40]

These are rather meaningless descriptions, and we can only conjecture as to their rationalization. What, for example, is the "parity" of silver? In view of various earlier statements, which were widely circulated, we are probably safe in assuming that the above-quoted objects refer to the relative proportions of silver and gold currency in our monetary system during the last years of the nineteenth century. But why such a restoration of balance should be desirable has never been explained on other than sentimental grounds. In the 1890's the proportion of gold in our monetary system had become dangerously low for a gold-standard country, a condition directly due in large part to the effects of our Silver Purchase Acts of 1878 and 1890. It is somewhat ironical that that very ill result of past silver purchases later served effectively as a reason for our vastly larger 1933 and 1934 purchase program.[41] The appeal was in a class with the very widely voiced demand that "silver should be restored to its rightful and ancient position alongside gold," a purely sentimental plea for a return to horse-and-buggy days. It is similar to the observation that "after all, silver has served mankind as currency for well over 2,500 years," [42] to the plea to restore silver to its "historic role as a precious metal," [43] or to such references as the "position held by silver since the beginning of history until 1873." [44]

In slightly different form, although possibly more effective in its appeal to Americans, is the recommendation that we should remonetize silver because "Hamilton was a bimetallist, Jefferson was a bimetallist, Washington was a bimetallist." [45] Would it not be just as logical to urge a revival of slavery because Washington held slaves?

Such were the arguments which caused our Government to seek and secure an international agreement on silver at London in 1933, which brought to American silver producers a market for their entire silver output at a great premium, and which made possible additional silver purchases on an unheard-of scale.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As to the results of the program, I refer the Senator from Utah to part I of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee's 1939 hearings on Senate bill 785, pages 17 to 62.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, of course I am very happy to stand corrected. At the same time, I think the argument referred to, no matter where or how used, was quite fantastic, and still remains quite fantastic. I am sorry to see it being used at the present time.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I desire to discuss the merits of the bill pending before the Senate. I have no interest in the two amendments, one offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the other by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. Suffice it to say that I am against both amendments. Likewise, I am against the provisions of the bill.

I had hoped that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. WAGNER] might be present, at least at the beginning of my remarks. I see that he is not present. I shall have to defer reference to a particular feature of the bill until he is present in the Chamber.

Mr. President, I now make the charge—with no reference to the distinguished author of the bill—that the bill is a Federal Reserve Board bill and a bankers' bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. For the information of the Senator, I will say that I have never consulted a banker or a member of the Federal Reserve Board in drafting the bill, or at any other time in reference to it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I do not intend any reflection upon the distinguished author of the bill.

Mr. President, the bill is supported by the Federal Reserve System and the members of that system.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The bill is supported by the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is supported by the members of the council which advises the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is true.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The members of the council are the heads of the great banks of the Nation; and they are unanimously against the use of silver, and in favor of the repeal of the Silver Purchase Act.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I might add further that the bill is also supported by a very large percentage of all the newspapers in the United States, including a great many in the Senator's own State.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I do not dispute that statement. I have seen in the RECORD quotations from editorials in various newspapers of the country on the bill; and I have yet to find in those editorials a single line which throws any light upon this question. So far as I can learn, the writers of the editorials know little, or nothing, of the silver problem, and they know less of the monetary problem.

Mr. President, the pending bill is of very great importance. It affects the pocketbook of every man and women in America. If enacted, it has possibilities of lowering the prices of the things which the people produce.

What was the condition of the country when the act was passed? At the beginning of this administration, in 1933, approximately 6,000 kinds and forms of money were in circulation in the United States. This administration thought that was too many kinds of money to be in circulation; and, as the result of conferences no doubt, it was decided to simplify our monetary system. Economic conditions made it seem obvious that we should go off the gold standard. When that was done, gold was taken out of circulation. Gold certificates were recalled from circulation. So, as the result of economic conditions, the country lost two forms of its money—gold coin in the first instance, and gold certificates in the second instance.

Mr. President, that was not all. The next thing that was done was to call in for redemption Federal Reserve bank notes; and the next thing that was done was to call in for redemption the national bank notes. So every time the administration decided to eliminate some form of existing currency it made currency more scarce in the United States. At the time these things happened there were between 5,000 and 6,000 national banks in the United States. Each of those banks had its own circulation. Each had its own form of national-bank notes. When the policy of retiring the national bank notes was adopted, those national bank notes were called in and canceled, thus still further reducing the amount of money in circulation.

At this point, Mr. President, I desire to place in the RECORD the exact facts which I have been discussing. First, I call attention to a statement from the Treasury Department dated February 28, 1933. That was just before the present administration came into power. At that time we had in [41] As to the reference to "gold which circulates in the United States," it was surprising to find such a statement being made in 1936, 3 years after the nationalization of gold. In 1936 gold did not circulate in the United States, and so this argument for silver purchases was then inapplicable.

circulation $571,000,000 in gold coin. In a month or two that gold coin was called in. It went out of circulation; and the moment the gold was ordered out of circulation it ceased to circulate, or, when it did circulate, it went to a bank and was retired. So we reduced our circulation by that one order in the sum of about $571,000,000 in gold coin.

As soon as the gold coin was ordered out of circulation the gold certificates were called in for cancellation. At that time we had $649,000,000 of gold certificates in circulation. Add the gold coin and gold certificates and we have a sum of more than $1,000,000,000 of real money taken out of circulation early in 1933. But that is not all.

A little further down this list we find Federal Reserve bank notes. At that time we had in circulation a few million dollars of those notes, but they were ordered out of circulation. At that time we had national bank notes in circulation in the sum of $860,000,000, and the moment national bank notes were ordered out of circulation, of course, they ceased to circulate, or when they came to a bank they were cashed and sent to the Treasury for retirement.

So by that one policy gold coins were taken out of circulation; gold certificates were taken out of circulation; Federal Reserve bank notes were taken out of circulation, and national bank notes were taken out of circulation. By that action and policy our circulating medium was contracted in a sum in excess of $2,000,000,000.

Mr. President, I think no one will disagree with my statement that as money became scarcer money became more valuable when measured in terms of property. So this policy was deflationary. The calling in of gold, the retirement of gold certificates, the retirement of gold coin, and the withdrawal from circulation of Federal Reserve bank notes and national bank notes had the result of contracting our currency in the total sum of over $2,000,000,000.

It was at that time that the policy was inaugurated of increasing the supply of silver certificates, if not silver dollars. So the law, to which I have referred, was designed to counteract the decrease in the then existing supply of money—and by money I mean the thing that one can see, the thing he can spend with a stranger. So in 1934 the present law was enacted. At that time we did not have very much silver in the United States. I shall place in the RECORD figures showing the exact amount. On February 28, 1933, we had in circulation of standard silver dollars some $28,000,000; we had silver certificates in circulation at that time to the extent of only $362,000,000. The two would not nearly take the place of the gold withdrawn from circulation; it would not take the place of gold certificates withdrawn from circulation; it would not take the place of national bank notes withdrawn from circulation. So the present silver law was passed with one objective, at least, and that was to furnish a satisfactory form of money to take the place of money withdrawn and canceled out of circulation.

Mr. President, silver has been money for a long time. I think history will bear out the statement that silver was, if not the first, at least one of the first things used for money throughout the world. So far back as we can go in history, silver has been the one metal, along with gold perhaps, that has served the peoples of the world. In the days of the American Colonies things or commodities were first used for money. In some sections of the eastern seaboard tobacco was used for money; in other sections Indian beads or wampum was used for money. Every colony, so I am advised, had a different system of money; but when the struggle with the mother country came and the Colonies were forced together for the purpose of defense, the first thing that had to be done was to devise something that might circulate among all the Colonies as money.

Mr. President, what was that thing? It was not tobacco; tobacco could not circulate among all the Colonies as money. It was not beads, wampum; they could not circulate among all the Colonies as money. The one thing that the Colonies agreed to use as a circulating medium throughout all the Colonies was silver.

At that time the Colonies had no mint; they did not have very much silver; but there was in circulation among the Colonies what was known as the Spanish milled dollar, which was a coin made of silver. I exhibit to the Senate a Spanish milled dollar which was in actual circulation in colonial days. This piece of silver [exhibiting] called a Spanish milled dollar, which I hold in my hand and exhibit to the Senate, has a date on its face of 1787. This particular coin was minted 2 years before the birth of this Government.

So, in the early days the Colonies agreed to accept Spanish milled dollars as they were then current in some sections of the eastern seaboard. The first unit in colonial days was a silver unit. It was not an American dollar; the American dollar had not been heard of at that time; it was not a gold dollar; the gold dollar had not been heard of at that time; but it was a coin known as the Spanish milled dollar.

Later on, after the Government was organized in 1789, when it was found to be necessary to have a system of money, the new Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Hamilton, was directed by the President to investigate the advisability of the establishment of a mint and the formation of a monetary system. Mr. Hamilton made a thorough study of the whole financial question, and very shortly he submitted a report recommending a definite system of money for the United States. Under that system a dollar made of silver came to be the unit of account for the monetary system of the United States. At that time the amount of silver recommended to go into the dollar was exactly the same amount that is in the dollar of today. I exhibit to the Senate a silver dollar that is today current throughout the United States. This coin has not been changed in 150 years save in one particular. The amount of pure silver in the dollar has never been changed, but the proportion of alloy has been changed. In the early days the silver dollar contained 12 points of alloy, whereas today it contains only 10 points of alloy; but the amount of pure silver in the dollar which is in circulation today throughout the country has not been changed since it was established in the early days of the United States Government shortly after it was formed in 1789.

So, Mr. President, silver has always been regarded as money in the United States. Silver was the basic unit of account for many years. Later on gold came into circulation. Then gold and silver circulated at a parity on a ratio approximately of 16 to 1 from the early days of the Nation up until about 1873. At one time, under the administration of Andrew Jackson, the silver dollar was more valuable in terms of property than was the then gold dollar. A slight adjustment was made during Andrew Jackson's administration seeking to bring the two species of money, the gold dollar and the silver dollar, to a parity. That was done. Two acts of Congress were passed during Jackson's administration in the effort to bring about the adjustment. Thereafter gold dollars and silver dollars circulated on a parity at a ratio of about 16 to 1 until 1873, when silver was demonetized as money. Silver continued, however, to be recognized as a form of money from that time until the present.

For many years, in the Congress, the issue over money was very acute. Many bills were passed seeking to revitalize and remonetize silver. Silver acts were passed providing for the purchase of silver and the coining of such silver into money. In 1900, it is true, the Congress passed what is known as the present Gold Standard Act, but, notwithstanding the enactment of that act, silver was then in circulation, and silver has continued to be in circulation ever since the enactment of the so-called gold-standard law in 1900.

Mr. President, the law which some now seek to repeal was enacted in 1934 for the specific purpose of increasing the amount of money in circulation—and by "money" I mean actual money; I mean specie as distinguished from credit money. The bill was passed, as I have said, in 1934. The Nation began to acquire silver. I think very little, if any, of that silver has been coined into standard silver dollars. The fact is that as silver was acquired by the Government the Treasury Department issued silver certificates against such silver, and those certificates were placed in circulation. As I said a moment ago, when this act was passed silver certificates were in circulation to the extent of $362,000,000 and silver dollars were in circulation to the amount of $30,000,000. We had a few more silver dollars than that, and a few more silver certificates.

I shall place in the RECORD the total amount of standard silver dollars in existence at the time of the enactment of the present law.

According to this statement—it is Form 1020 of the Treasury Department, of date February 28, 1933—at that time we had, of standard silver dollars, $540,007,703. At that time we had silver certificates in the sum of $482,682,100. Of course, as the silver dollars accumulated in the Treasury, the Treasury in turn issued certificates against them and kept those certificates in constant circulation. As a result of our silver policy, we have increased the amount of our silver certificates in circulation from the amount just stated of approximately half a billion dollars until on the 29th of April 1940, only 2 or 3 days ago, we had silver certificates in circulation to the amount of $1,818,697,732.

So it is true that through this policy we have increased the permanent money in circulation in this country from about half a billion dollars to $1,800,000,000. That means that this policy has been the direct means of increasing the permanent money supply about $1,300,000,000.

A while ago I made the statement that this bill is a Federal Reserve bank bill and a bankers' bill. That statement is true, and that is all there is to this fight. It may be asked, Why are the bankers and the Federal Reserve System against silver? The answer is plain. As we get silver and issue Treasury certificates against it, the banks get no interest on that money. The silver is received by the Treasury. The Treasury prints paper and circulates the paper. It does not necessarily go out through the Federal Reserve banks; and neither the Federal Reserve banks nor any other banks, for that matter, get any interest whatever on a silver certificate. The banks do not like that. To the extent that we place in circulation permanent money on which they get no interest, their interest money goes out of circulation. It goes out of existence. If we could put in circulation four, five, or six billion dollars of silver certificates or United States notes, there would be little, if any, occasion for any Federal Reserve notes; and if there were no Federal Reserve notes, the Federal Reserve System, as a system, would fold up and collapse for want of revenue to support the system.

The Federal Reserve System is maintained through interest on the notes it issues, and through the loans it makes; and if we eliminate the Federal Reserve notes, we eliminate the interest the Federal Reserve banks get on those notes. So, to the extent that we have issued silver certificates, we have driven out of circulation Federal Reserve notes; and to the extent we have done that we have diminished the interest which the Federal Reserve banks receive, and which the big banks of the Nation receive.

Mr. President, I will not ask the Senate to take my word upon that proposition. The hearings on this bill are clear, and I shall refer briefly to a few sentences from them.

Mr. Eccles is the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. Mr. Eccles testified in behalf of this bill. Mr. Eccles, speaking for the Federal Reserve Board, for the Federal Reserve System, and for the big banks of the Nation, is for this bill, which means he is against silver.

I quote from the testimony of Mr. Eccles on page 70 of the hearings on this bill. In the middle of that page Mr. Eccles says:

> As a matter of fact, silver certificates have displaced Federal Reserve notes to a certain extent. Nearly all the dollar bills, the greater part of the $5 bills, and a portion of the $10 bills, are now silver certificates.

He admits that the issuance of silver certificates replaces and drives out of circulation Federal Reserve notes; and when a Federal Reserve note goes out of circulation it goes back to the Federal Reserve System, where it is canceled. Then they do not get interest on the circulation of that Federal Reserve note. So the banks of the Federal Reserve System are against silver. They are against United States notes. They would be against gold certificates. They would like to see gold, theoretically, come back into circulation, because they know it would not actually circulate. It would be in circulation for them to keep in their vaults and to have in reserve, and probably no gold certificates would be issued against it; so they would be for gold coin coming back into circulation, but they are against silver coin coming into circulation, because silver and silver coins are not now held to be a satisfactory reserve.

At another place in the hearings I quote from Mr. Eccles. On page 73 of the hearings I quote again from his testimony. At that place he says:

> The issuance of silver certificates does not change the amount of currency outstanding but results in the substitution of silver certificates for the same amount of other currency in circulation.

There are two admissions, two positive, unqualified statements. First, when silver is placed in circulation or silver certificates are placed in circulation, they drive out other kinds of currency. When they are placed in circulation they drive out Federal Reserve notes, because that now is the only other kind of circulation we have. At the present time there is no gold or gold coin in circulation; only silver and Federal Reserve notes, and United States notes; that is true, but United States notes are not being redeemed.

In the days of Lincoln, when United States notes were first issued, they had to be issued because there was nothing else to use for money. We had no gold; we had no silver; we had to have money; and the so-called Lincoln greenbacks were printed and circulated with which to finance the so-called War between the States. After the war was over, and the country got back on its feet again, and taxes began to come in, the Department of the Treasury began to retire the so-called Lincoln greenbacks. As the greenbacks were retired, money became scarcer; and as money became scarcer, money became dearer; and as money became dearer, prices began to fall. The Congress in those days was wise enough to understand at least something about the money question; and when Congress saw money becoming scarce, and prices beginning to fall, it passed a law which provided that from the date of its enactment the greenbacks should not be retired.

That law did not have the full effect desired. Congress passed a law providing that the greenbacks could not be retired, but still the banks collected the greenbacks and would not put them in circulation; so then Congress passed a second law providing that not only should the greenbacks not be retired, but when they should be paid into the Treasury for any purpose whatever they should not then be canceled, but should be placed back in circulation, and kept in constant circulation. So, Mr. President, from that day until this not a single dollar in greenbacks has been canceled, and the law now is that the greenbacks shall be kept in circulation; but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to exactly how this law is being observed.

It is now the law that the greenbacks shall be kept in constant circulation. I exhibit to the Senate a sheet similar to the one referred to just a moment ago, but of a different month. I now call attention to Form No. 1028 of the Treasury Department, the issue of March 31, 1940, only a little over 1 month ago. On that date we had in circulation $44,000,000 of silver dollars, and we had in circulation $1,507,000,000 of silver certificates, but the Federal Reserve System held in its vaults the sum of $263,000,000 of silver certificates.

Now, let me show what is being done about United States notes. Silver certificates are in existence; they are in circulation; but the Federal Reserve System will not permit the full amount to be placed in circulation and kept in circulation.

In regard to United States notes, on March 31, 1940, we had the full amount we have had now for 70 years—that is, $346,681,016 in Lincoln greenbacks. Under the law those notes are supposed to be kept in constant circulation, but on March 31, 1940, the Federal Reserve Board had hoarded up in the vaults of its banks $84,000,000 of United States notes.

To the extent that they can hoard silver certificates, to the extent that they can hoard United States notes, they can make money scarcer, so that if the people have a demand for money and the banks have a demand for money they will not send out silver certificates; they will not send out greenbacks; but they will send out their own Federal Reserve notes, on which they get interest. There is no interest on silver certificates and they will not send them out. There is no interest on greenbacks and they will not send them out. So, while I am not saying that the distinguished author of this measure is aware that his bill is a Federal Reserve bank bill and a big-bankers' bill, nevertheless, that is exactly the case; and, from my viewpoint, that is the only excuse for the bill being before the Senate. It is an attempt to make money scarce.

Mr. President, if this bill shall be passed, there will soon follow, in my judgment, a bill to repeal the law providing for the purchase of domestically mined silver. If Congress still further discredits silver, in my judgment, a bill will soon be prepared and introduced repealing the so-called subsidy upon domestically mined silver. We shall first discredit silver still further by the passage of this measure. We shall next discredit silver still further by stopping the so-called subsidy to the domestic miners. Then we shall have silver about where we want it from the standpoint of the Federal Reserve System and the standpoint of the big bankers of the country. Still one more bill must be passed, however, and that is a bill that will stop the circulation of silver certificates—exactly as we stopped the circulation of gold certificates, but for another reason, at the beginning of this administration. If the bankers can call in the silver certificates and replace them with Federal Reserve notes, thus taking silver dollars out of circulation, as was done with regard to gold, then what kind of money will we have left? We will have but two kinds. Eight years ago we had 6,000 kinds of money. Now we have got down to about three kinds—that is, silver, United States notes, and Federal Reserve notes.

Those are the only kinds there are now. Of course I do not count pennies and dimes and nickels and quarters as money. That is change, and it is legal tender, but, in my estimation, it is not used in the calculation. So if the pending bill shall be enacted, the movement will be on its way to get silver and silver certificates out of circulation. That will leave, then, two kinds of money, United States notes and Federal Reserve notes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not told us what form the other bill, which must follow if this one shall be passed, to take silver certificates out of circulation, will take. It is quite evident, from what the Senator has said, that if we enact this bill, then another one, to stop the purchase of American-produced silver, will be passed, and that by those two bills we will stop the purchase of silver and its circulation to that extent. But to take care of the amount already in circulation will take another bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Another bill will be necessary to get it out of circulation.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not described the form of that bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The form of that bill I cannot foretell. Eight years ago there were almost a billion dollars of national bank notes in circulation. They are not in circulation now. They went out of circulation. We have retired those national bank notes. Something has taken their place.

As I have stated, the gold certificates are out of circulation. As to the form of the third bill, to get rid of silver. I cannot now say, but some bill will be proposed, and probably passed, retiring silver certificates, and replacing them with Federal Reserve notes. If that shall be done, silver certificates will be out of circulation, as national bank notes are out of circulation.

National bank notes did not draw any interest. There were a billion dollars of national bank notes in circulation, from time immemorial, until 8 years ago. The Federal Reserve System got no interest on national bank notes, and national bank notes are now history. There were gold certificates in circulation. No interest was paid on gold certificates, and gold certificates are now history. There were the Treasury notes of 1890. No interest was received from those, and they were ordered called years ago. A million dollars' worth of Treasury notes of 1890 are still out. They are perhaps lost, or in hoarding somewhere, or perhaps have been destroyed. As soon as one shows up, it is canceled. They are not in circulation.

I am making the forecast that if this bill passes, the next bill will be to stop the purchase of domestically mined silver. If we discredit silver here today by the enactment of the pending bill, then Congress and the country will have a right to assume that Congress is against silver; that silver is no more valuable for money than is copper, or lead, or zinc, or some other form of base metal.

Mr. President, if that happens, then, in my judgment, for the same reason the national bank notes have gone out of circulation, for the same reason that the Federal Reserve tried to do away with United States notes, the powers behind this bill will concentrate on some program to get rid of the silver certificates, and if they succeed, they will be replaced by $1,800,000,000 of Federal Reserve notes, and each one of those Federal Reserve notes would draw interest for the Federal Reserve System.

If that should happen, we would have then but two kinds of money: first, permanent money, United States notes; and, second, temporary money, Federal Reserve notes. If these forces are as powerful as that, they will introduce another bill very shortly, to retire United States notes. Then what will we have left? One form of money, and one form only, that is, Federal Reserve notes, subject to being placed in circulation at the will of the bank, and subject to be called at the will of the bank. Then we will have rubber money in truth and in fact, a dollar of one purchasing power today, perhaps, and a dollar of another purchasing power tomorrow. All printed money will be removed from circulation, and the only kind we will have left will be the temporary money, which can be placed in circulation at will and withdrawn at will.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. HUGHES. What rate of interest will the Federal Reserve notes bear, those which the Senator predicts?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Federal Reserve System tries to control credit through the rate of interest which it charges on its loans. It is true that under the law the Federal Reserve System may charge the very highest rate for its money, and under the same law it may charge a lower rate for its money. That is the way the Federal Reserve System controls the amount of credit in existence. If credit becomes tight it reduces the rate in order to stimulate the use of credit. If credit becomes too plentiful it raises the rate on its loans, to make it very expensive to use credit. For that reason we would have but one temporary form of money, put out at will, contracted at will, and then we would have a monetary system which would be in the hands of a particular group, not the Congress, not a Federal agency, but a private agency, which could do what it wanted with the money of the people of the United States.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is the Senator familiar with the rate of interest charged by the Federal Reserve at the present time?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I cannot tell the Senator the rate of interest being charged at the present time. It is very low.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is very low, less than 1 percent.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is very low, it is true. That is from the necessities of the case. The Government has to borrow vast sums of money, and, of course, the Government is interested in financing its borrowings at the lowest possible rate. But the fact is that while the Federal Reserve at the present time is willing to lend money to the Government at a very low rate, indeed, the loans to the member banks are not made at such a low rate of interest.

Mr. President, the money question, I know, is somewhat involved. It has been stated on the floor many times during recent years that we are paying too much for gold. Almost every day we hear it said that $35 an ounce for gold is entirely too much to pay. In my judgment, those who make that charge do not understand the first principle of our monetary system.

In 1900, to be specific, Congress passed a law making gold the basis of the money of the United States. At that time and since that time gold has been regarded as the basic money of the world. Until recently gold was the basis of all domestic money throughout the world, as well as exchange money. Gold today is the basis of all exchange, but it is not the basis of domestic money. So in 1900, I think it was, we declared that gold was the basic primary metal money of the United States, and Congress fixed 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine as the amount we would call a dollar. At that rate of gold in the dollar, 25.8 grains nine-tenths fine, an ounce would coin $20.67 worth of money. If those figures are accurate—and they are—an ounce of gold contains enough metal to coin, under the old system, $20.67 of gold coin. That means that one-twentieth and sixty-seven one-hundredths of an ounce of gold became a dollar.

I have a very crude diagram which I desire to exhibit to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and the other Senators who are doing me the honor of listening to me. I have here a pasteboard disk. For the purposes of my argument let us assume that this disk is an ounce of gold. It is made round in order to make my demonstration a little more intelligent.

I have marked on this disk a series of spokes, making the disk resemble a wheel. This ounce of gold was worth $20.67 prior to our gold devaluation. That meant that you could take an ounce of gold and cut it into 20 parts and sixty-seven one-hundredths of a part, and each whole part would be a dollar.

Gold is supposed to have intrinsic value. Paper has practically no intrinsic value. But gold, the thing with which we redeem our paper money, is supposed to have intrinsic value, and for the purposes of my argument it does have an intrinsic value. It is something which people desire; it is something which men go into the earth to dig for; it is something which people search sand and gravel throughout the earth to find. So this ounce of gold could be divided into twenty and sixty-seven one-hundredths parts, and each part would be a dollar. That would mean that each of the parts between the spokes, for example, the part I am now indicating, and which I take out, is one-twentieth of the whole. That piece contains enough gold to be a dollar under the old system. That would mean that the ounce of gold would coin 20 gold dollars and 67 cents of another gold dollar.

Of course, at the time to which I have been referring we measured all our commodities and all our property in gold; so if we said that a bushel of wheat was worth a dollar, it was worth that amount of gold, indicated by the crude illustration. In other words, this much gold [indicating] could be exchanged for one bushel of wheat.

We found that because of increased demand for money throughout the world, and the increase in debts throughout the world, the demand for money vastly increased. Whereas years ago a few dollars would transact the business of a community, or of a State, or of a nation, because of increased population, increased trade and commerce, increased debt, and increased taxes, the people had to have more money. Gold was not being produced in proportion to the demand for money; that is, the increase in the production of gold was not comparable with the increase in the demand for gold. So gold began to increase in value. By February of 1933 the little piece of gold I indicate, representing a dollar, had so increased in value that it was worth $1.67 in terms of property. The people of the country who produced wheat, and cotton, and corn, and livestock, and all the other commodities produced in America, had to get money for them. The money is convertible into gold, and in order for people to get a silver dollar or a gold dollar, they had to produce on the average $1.67 worth of whichever commodity was to be exchanged for the amount of gold shown by one-twentieth of the disk I exhibit.

As the result of the increased value of gold, the increased value of the dollar, and consequent falling of prices, the people were not able to produce sufficient cotton to provide $1.67 worth, on the average, to get a dollar. They could not produce sufficient wheat to provide $1.67 worth, on the average, to get a dollar. The same thing was true with respect to livestock. As a result the agricultural population of America went bankrupt. They could not pay their bills; they could not pay their taxes. There were foreclosures on every hand. The same thing that applied to farmers applied to the producers of almost all raw materials.

So in 1933 Congress proceeded to decrease the size of the gold dollar, which meant increasing the price paid for an ounce of gold.

Mr. President, this may be somewhat intricate, but it should be very simple. Under the old system this disk of gold was worth $20.67. It could be coined into 20 gold dollars and 67 cents over. When we increased the price of gold to $35 an ounce we did it by decreasing the size of the gold dollar.

In 1930, before devaluation came, it took one-twentieth of an ounce of gold to make a dollar, because gold was worth $20 an ounce plus. When we increased the price of gold to $35 an ounce, then we had another picture before us. I turn the disk over. On the other side I have the same wheel, but instead of having 20 compartments we now have 35 compartments, because this gold disk weighing 1 ounce can now be coined into 35 gold dollars. What does that mean in its effect upon commodities? I will show the Senate what it means. Under the old system a bushel of wheat was worth, for example, one-twentieth of an ounce of gold, as represented by the part of the disk which I exhibit to the Senate. Under the new system we made a new dollar containing only 15 grains plus of gold; that is, we put only as much gold in it as I exhibit on this disk. We reduced the size of the gold dollar so that the new gold dollar contains today 15$\frac{5}{21}$ grains of gold. It is slightly more than one-half as large as was the old gold dollar. Today an ounce of gold, instead of coining $20 in gold, will coin $35 in gold. That means that the gold dollar today is only slightly more than one-half as large as it was before.

Someone may ask: "How does this system affect prices?" It is very simple. Under the old system of $20 to an ounce of gold the gold dollar was of the size I indicated before removing a part of this disk. Take wheat, for example. Before 1933 wheat was worth, for example, a dollar a bushel; that is, it took that much gold to buy a bushel of wheat, or it took a bushel of wheat to buy that much gold. Wheat is always measured in gold because it is a world commodity. It has the same value in terms of gold throughout the world, making allowance for transportation and insurance. Wheat is worth the same in Russia, in France, and everywhere in terms of gold if it is going to be exported, and that is the way we measure the value of wheat. Wheat is worth so much in value of gold.

Under the old system it was worth a piece of gold of the size I indicate; that is, a dollar. But when we changed our valuation that piece of gold, formerly one dollar, became of the value of $1.69. A bushel of wheat is worth this piece of gold. Formerly that piece of gold was worth a dollar, but now it is worth $1.69. So by devaluation of the dollar, which means increasing the price of gold per ounce from $20 to $35, we increased the price of wheat from $1 to $1.69 a bushel.

Mr. President, those—if there be any—who favor reducing the price of gold per ounce in terms of dollars, favor putting more gold in the dollar, making the dollar a larger chunk of gold, and to the extent that they favor increasing the size of the gold dollar, to that extent they favor a decrease in the price of commodities.

We now measure everything by gold. It is the measuring device of the world. But, Mr. President, if the pending bill shall be passed silver is history. We are acquiring much of the gold in the world, and we are acquiring it pretty fast. I called attention to that sometime ago. There are only $27,000,000,000 of gold in the world so far as we know—less than $28,000,000,000. Of that sum we had on the 29th of April, 3 days ago, the sum of $18,754,000,000. In other words, we have practically $19,000,000,000 of the world's gold. That is nineteen twenty-sevenths or nineteen twenty-eights of all the gold in the world. If this bill shall pass silver will be discredited. No other nation is trying to use silver save the United States, nor is any other nation able to use silver, and if, after full deliberation, we discredit silver, then silver will be a memory.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is there any other country using silver now?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a number of countries use silver. I do not know of any country which may be said to have a stable monetary standard based on silver. Here is a Mexican silver peso. When one goes to Mexico all he sees there is Mexican pesos.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I want to say that this bill does not discredit silver. It merely stops the purchase of silver from foreign countries.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes, I know, Mr. President. That is the statement of the Senator from Delaware. But if we pass his bill, what chance would any future Congress have, or what chance would any future Senator or Representative have who tried to favor silver as a monetary metal? No one can prophesy that with any assurance.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We have a law on the books providing for the purchase of silver at a price fixed.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes; but as I said a moment ago in the Senator's absence, if his bill should pass, I would not say that the Senator from Delaware would come forth in a few days with a bill to repeal the law providing for the purchase of domestically mined silver, but if he should not do so, somebody else would. If Congress puts its condemnation on silver, it is only a question of time until there is introduced in this body a bill to repeal the use of silver entirely. Then the second bill to follow will be a bill to retire the silver certificates, as we retired the gold certificates, as we retired the Treasury notes of 1890, as we retired the Federal Reserve bank notes, and as we retired a billion dollars of national bank currency in the past 8 years.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. A year or two ago we passed a law which is a permanent statute fixing the price of domestic silver at the equivalent of approximately 71 cents per ounce. While that is a permanent law, and will remain so until repealed or modified by Congress, does the Senator from Oklahoma agree with the theory which I entertain, that if the United States withdraws from the purchase of foreign silver, the world price of which is now about 35 cents an ounce, automatically the world price of silver will be reduced to some 20 cents or 25 cents an ounce, because the question of supply and demand controls the price of silver to some extent, as it does other things? Does the Senator agree with that theory?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It cannot be disputed, Mr. President, that if we pass the pending bill the Government, of course, immediately will stop buying silver. There will be no quotation on the boards in New York or any place else where we will accept or buy silver at a certain price. Then the speculators of the world will enter the market and become active in buying and selling silver. Boards of trade will be set up in New York and other places, and silver will be dealt in exactly as copper and other commodities are now dealt in.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the world price of silver should decline to 20 cents or 25 cents, would it not inevitably make it harder for us to maintain a permanent statute that fixes the price of domestic silver at 71 cents?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, if the Congress favors this bill, I cannot imagine anyone, excepting the Senators from those States which have a major interest in the production of silver, being favorable to paying a subsidy on domestically mined silver.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course, the statute is on the books now. It is the law. We would have to repeal the law to change that.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the Congress can repeal the existing law.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course, it can; but this is authority of Congress that has been given to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase foreign silver and fix the price. He fixes the price, which is evidenced by the fact that last year, when my bill passed, he changed the price from 43 cents to 35 cents.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. That was because the world prices went down. It was not a fixing of prices by the Secretary of the Treasury, because he testified before the committee that he is paying the world price now, and has been paying it, and that price has gone down from fifty-odd cents to 35 cents, because the world price has gone down, and the Secretary of the Treasury follows the world price as it goes down. He does not fix the price, but he follows it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will permit me, I want to differ with that statement. The Secretary of the Treasury fixes the price, and he fixes it at any time he desires, and at any price he chooses. He changed the price from 43 cents to 35 cents, and he can change it to 30 cents today if he so desires.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator knows, of course, that the Secretary of the Treasury fixes the price of the gold he takes, but he does not fix the world price. The reason why he reduced the price of silver from 43 cents to 35 cents was that the world price fell; and he paid and is now paying what is recognized as the world price for silver.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Why does not the Secretary of the Treasury fix the price, when we get all the silver that is offered from Mexico and all other countries? It all comes here, and he fixes the price. Suppose some other country were paying 36 cents. We would not get the silver. Suppose some other country were paying 40 cents. We would not get the silver. The Secretary of the Treasury has the authority to fix the price, and he fixes the price.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Under the existing law the Secretary of the Treasury is not obligated to buy a single ounce of silver. He is under no direction to buy a single ounce of silver, today, tomorrow, this month, next month, or next year.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I beg to differ with the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I know the law. The law requires the Secretary of the Treasury eventually—there is no fixed time—to buy silver until the price of silver rises to $1.29 an ounce, or until one-fourth of our total monetary stock is represented by silver, which would be one-third as much silver as gold, in terms of dollars.

Silver is the only metal today used for money which has a value throughout the world. We cannot obtain gold money. We have no gold money, as such. In no place in the world can we obtain a gold coin. We can still obtain silver coin.

Mr. President, I have here, and I exhibit to the Senate, a Mexican peso. It is worth less than 20 cents. If I should gather a group of boys and girls from any country on earth and pitch out this Mexican peso, worth 20 cents, and then scatter a handful of paper money gathered from the face of the earth, which money would the youngsters scramble for? I think they would scramble for the silver money. I should not limit that statement to boys and girls. I should apply it to the United States Senate.

I have here a wad of money collected from various parts of the world. What is this paper money worth? Does the Senator know?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What fixes the value of the silver dollar, as well as of the paper dollar? It is the stamping which is done by the United States, is it not?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, that question is most academic. It is the stamp on the paper, and it is the stamp on the silver which gives both the paper and silver their monetary value. It is not the stamp on the gold which gives gold its monetary value. A piece of gold with no stamp whatever on it is worth as much to the man who knows its value as a piece of gold which is stamped. The only thing the stamp does to a $20 gold piece is to certify that it contains so much gold, nine-tenths fine. That is all the stamp does. But on paper money the stamp is everything.

I exhibit to the Senate some pieces of paper. Here is a Diaz 10-peso note. How much am I offered for it?

Mr. NORRIS. I offer a quarter.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I would not take the Senator's money. That is more than it is worth, because it is the money of a defunct government.

Mr. NORRIS. The offer still stands. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I exhibit to the Senate another piece of paper money. It is stamped "$2." It is issued by the city of Detroit. How much am I offered for a $2 bill issued by the city of Detroit?

Mr. BARKLEY. A nickel. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I would not take the Senator's money, because that is a nickel more than it is worth—not because the money of Detroit is not good, but because the money has been redeemed.

I exhibit to the Senate a United States 50-cent note. I doubt if any of the youngsters of the Senate ever before saw a piece of money like this. It is a piece of good money. It is a 50-cent piece. It is a "shinplaster" of Civil War days. It is a Lincoln greenback in the sum of 50 cents, issued during Mr. Lincoln's time, because it carries his picture.

Mr. President, paper money is good in the country where it circulates. What paper money circulates in America save American money? None. What American money circulates abroad? None, except among a few persons who know paper money and know its value. If one were to give a porter in a foreign country a paper dollar, the porter would look at the giver, look at the paper, and the chances are he would shake his head. He would not want to take it. He would take silver. One can pay porters anywhere in the world with silver money. They understand it. They can count it. But if one gives paper money to uneducated persons anywhere in the world, they shake their heads. They will not accept paper money. Paper money is all right domestically, but it is no good outside the territorial limits of the country where it is in circulation.

I have here a piece of money which looks rather peculiar. If I should offer it to some youngster who is not used to accepting money the chances are he would not take it. If one should take it to a cashier in a restaurant and offer it in payment of his bill, the chances are it would not be accepted. It is nothing more or less than a $2 bill of the old "saddle blanket" variety. It is much larger than the modern bill, but it is perfectly good money. It can be spent anywhere in the United States, but if it were offered to anyone outside the United States he would shake his head.

Mr. President, persons outside the United States do not shake their heads at silver. If one takes a silver coin anywhere in the world, that coin is worth something. One might offer a $100 bill in paper money outside the United States. The recipient might shake his head and refuse to give in exchange for the $100 bill a coin of the lowest denomination, because he would not know the value of the $100 bill.

It is now proposed to discredit the only kind of money we have which is recognized as such throughout the world today. We cannot obtain gold money. We do not know when we shall be able to obtain gold money. We have silver. We can keep the silver. However, the Senator's bill would kill silver. Silver has been killed time and time again, but it still has a little life left.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator says my bill would kill silver. I disagree with him. I want to stop the purchase of foreign silver. A dollar bill has back of it 27 cents worth of silver. That is what the silver costs. It has on it the stamp of the Government, which makes that paper money worth something; and there is the same amount of silver in the silver dollar. We do not refuse to take it because it has only 27 cents worth of silver in it. It has the stamp of the United States on it, and we take it. We have buried at West Point nearly $1,000,000,000 worth of silver which has not been coined into money. If we had use for the foreign silver in our monetary system the problem would be different. We have no use for it. We have the silver buried up at West Point. We do not use it, and we are paying foreign governments with our goods, for something for which we have no use, an exorbitant price fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the same thing could be said of gold. If the pending bill discrediting silver is passed—and before it is passed I understand an amendment is to be offered adding the word "gold"—we shall stop the purchase of silver and gold. That means stopping the purchase of foreign silver and foreign gold. If the bill is passed, silver, as money and as a basis of money, will be passé. It will be a thing of the past.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Delaware continually makes the assertion that we are trading our goods for silver for which we have no use. We are trading our goods, which we do not ourselves need, which we do not ourselves consume, for silver.

This is the only time in my experience in the Congress of the United States, extending over a quarter of a century, when anybody has ever asserted that silver is of no value or that it is useless. If, as a matter of commerce and employment of our people, we have to decide between piling up some silver which may be temporarily useless and piling up unsalable surpluses of goods which are equally useless, which would be the wiser course to pursue—to stop the production of goods which we cannot sell and thereby throw other men out of employment, or to go on producing those goods and selling them in return for silver, which, in my judgment, is not only useful now but will be more useful in the future?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, let me answer that question. If the bill is passed silver will be through. If the flood of gold keeps on coming to America, in 2 or 3 years—3 years at the most—we shall have all the monetary gold in the world. What will then be the condition? With silver discredited, it will no longer be money, or the basis of money. It will be only a commodity, like copper, lead, and zinc. Silver will be dead. Then, if we shall have all the gold in the world in our vaults in America, there will be no more gold to be used as the basis of trade. There is now no gold in circulation. At that time there will be no gold to support the exchange of the world.

Then what will happen? What will happen is what is happening today in some countries which have neither gold nor silver. Countries such as Germany, with neither gold nor silver, are strictly upon a barter basis. When that time comes in America, we shall be unable to sell our goods for silver. We will not accept it. We shall be willing to sell our goods for gold, but nobody will have any gold with which to pay for them. We shall have it all. What are we to do with our automobiles? We will not accept silver for them, and we shall not be able to obtain gold for them, because no one will have any gold. We shall be unable to sell a single car abroad. What shall we do with our surplus wheat? We shall be unable to sell it. Other nations will not be able to pay us, either with silver or with gold. What shall we do with our surplus cotton in the South, one-half of which we must sell abroad in order to sustain that great industrial and farming area? What shall we do with the surplus products of America? We shall be unable to obtain gold for them. We will not accept silver.

We shall begin to trade wheat for coffee, and we shall get all the coffee in the world each year. We shall begin to trade cotton for silk, and we shall get all the silk in the world each year and begin to lay it away, because the balance of trade will be in our favor. Whatever commodity we accept we will get more of it; we will get all there is, if we are willing to trade our surplus products for it, because all they have to pay with is their manufactured goods, their coffee or rubber, or silk, or something else that we will accept. What will be the end?

Mr. President, I am still waiting for the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], the chairman of the great Banking and Currency Committee, who, together with members of the committee who are now on the floor, reported the pending bill to the Senate. A year ago the Senate adopted a resolution in effect directing the Committee on Banking and Currency, a conservative committee, a brainy committee, an experienced committee, one of the best committees in the Senate, to make a thorough study of our financial, monetary, and banking systems. It has been a year since that was done. Have they undertaken their work? I understood they talked about it one day; but have they done anything to bring about a solution of the monetary question?

Mr. President, I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee, if he were here, if this bill is the result of a study of a year? Is this bill a part of the reformed banking and currency and financial program which we are to follow in the future?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I happen to be a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I can answer the Senator that the pending bill is not a product of the investigation which the Senate ordered last year. If it were, I would conclude that the mountain had labored and brought forth a chigger, not even a mouse. [Laughter.]

The truth of the matter is that the Senator from New York, chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, has set in motion the machinery to lay foundations for the investigation which the Senate ordered it to make. It has done that by asking various agencies of the Government, including the Federal Reserve System, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Treasury Department, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the other lending agencies, to submit information in response to a long questionnaire, carefully prepared by the committee and by its employees, in order that we might collect certain information from the proper departments of the Government, to be used as a basis for hearings and further investigation by the committee later.

Those questionnaires have gone out. I am not informed as to the number of responses which have been made or as to the information which has been collected; but that much has been done in laying the foundation for the investigation and the conclusions which the Senator has in mind.

One of the reasons, among other reasons, why I opposed this bill in the committee, and why I oppose it on the floor, is that if we are going to investigate the monetary question, which involves gold and silver and all other forms of currency, then, it seems to me folly to cut off one of the very prongs of the question which the Committee on Banking and Currency is supposed to investigate and report upon.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I was proposing to use that as one argument against this bill. This investigation has not been held, and until the investigation is held, and a report made to the Senate, recommending, perhaps, that this kind of legislation be enacted, I am not willing that the pending bill shall pass, and I shall not vote for it.

Mr. ADAMS and Mr. TOWNSEND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield first to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. I merely wish to supplement the statement of the Senator from Kentucky by pointing out that the first two pages of the questionnaire are devoted to inquries relative to silver in its various phases.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I now yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I agree that the first two pages are devoted to silver, but this bill has been before the Senate for a long time; it passed the Senate once, but was defeated in conference. The committee have not only held very elaborate hearings on it, but have reported the bill, and recommended that it be passed.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Any metal that has a record of 6,000 years as a monetary metal, anything we are using for money and have used for money for 150 years, and anything we now have in circulation to the extent of $2,000,000,000, in my judgment, should not be cast aside until the Banking and Currency Committee have made a thorough study of the whole monetary problem and have submitted a report which may be considered as an entity.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I say that the Banking and Currency Committee made investigation and reported the pending bill?

Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understood the Senator to say that Federal Reserve notes involved interest payments. I think the Senator said that, did he not?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Federal Reserve System makes loans to banks. Of course if a bank has a balance with the Federal Reserve System, and desires to cash that balance in the form of notes, it can do so, but if the bank desires to increase its holdings and borrows from the Federal Reserve bank and then obtains notes, of course, the bank pays interest on such notes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to quote, if I may, from the statement of Mr. Eccles, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. He says:

> It has been stated that the circulation of Federal Reserve notes involves interest payments, while the circulation of silver certificates does not. The fact is that the issuance of Federal Reserve notes as such does not involve interest payments any more than the issuance of any other kind of currency. A person who has a bank deposit can withdraw it in currency and does not have to pay interest; a person who has no deposit and has to borrow must pay interest on his loan regardless of the kind of currency in which he withdraws the proceeds, or whether he leaves them on deposit and checks against them.
> The issuance of silver certificates in payment for silver purchases by the Treasury in no way diminishes interest payments on the public debt. If the Treasury paid for silver purchased out of its regular funds, it would have to increase the public debt by the amount of those payments, but the Treasury does not in fact pay for silver in that way, and no proposal has been made that it should do so. Consequently, the issuance of silver certificates has no bearing whatsoever on the interest burden of the Government.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am glad to have the Senator make that admission, and to read from the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, because in his report the Senator says the silver-buying program is a burden upon the people of America; yet he just read from the testimony of the head of our financial system, so called, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, who makes the statement which I will reread:

Consequently, the issuance of silver certificates has no bearing whatsoever on the interest burden of the Government.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is correct. I quote further from Mr. Eccles' testimony:

In a period of tight money, when member banks were in debt to the Reserve banks, the issuance of silver certificates, just as of greenbacks, would ease the situation by giving banks reserve money with which to repay their borrowings at Federal Reserve banks. But this result could be accomplished as effectively by open-market operations by the Reserve banks, which would not raise any problems of currency inflation. In any case, this is not the problem today, when banks are out of debt and have a huge volume of excess reserves.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I shall close in a moment because the chairman of the subcommittee handling the appropriation bill for the Interior Department desires to call up that bill, and I have no objection to that being done.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Before I close, I will yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, perhaps this is an inopportune time to make the suggestion, but I was about to observe that an amendment has been tendered to the pending bill which calls for liberating the gold which is locked up at Fort Knox and other places and using it in circulation. Obviously, that amendment is germane to the bill under consideration; and, therefore, if we are to consider further the silver bill, we must consider the amendment which I have offered, which deals with gold. So it seems to me that the whole question ought to be considered, I shall not say de novo, but considered in its entirety, gold and silver, in connection with our financial system.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, it is well known to all those present that the Constitution puts the problem of money upon the back of the Congress. The Constitution says that "the Congress shall have the power to coin money" and "regulate the value thereof."

No other tribunal has that power. The Congress might create a tribunal within certain limitations to do that thing, but the Congress has not done so. Therefore, what we have for money, good or bad, and what we shall have is the responsibility of the Congress of the United States, and at the present time the Treasury Department, as well as the other departments, are conceding that responsibility to us. Not very long ago I introduced a bill with regard to our surplus gold. That bill was sent to the Treasury and other departments mentioned in the bill. The Secretary of the Treasury, acting through his agent, reported on the bill, stating that inasmuch as the Senate had ordered an exhaustive study and investigation of monetary and financial questions and the banking system, they would not care to make any recommendations about the bill introduced by me, which I take it to mean any bill on monetary questions. The Secretary of State made a similar report upon the same bill. I do not have before me the Treasury Department report, but I have the report from the Secretary of State, and the language is practically the same in both. The Secretary of State says:

It would appear that action with respect to the bill might well be deferred pending such further study as the Congress may wish to give to the determination of a national monetary and banking policy.

Mr. President, the Government is not going to buy very much more silver; it is coming in now very slowly; its purchase is discretionary and within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury. So until the study which is now under way can be completed I urge as an objection, which, from my standpoint, cannot be waived, that the pending bill should not be passed until that study shall have been made and the report submitted to the Senate of the United States.

AMERICA'S POLICY TOWARD INSULAR POSSESSIONS OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, last Sunday night I had the honor to speak over the coast-to-coast network of the Mutual Broadcasting System in a debate with my colleagues the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN], the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] on America's policy toward insular possessions of foreign countries. The debate was presented by the American Forum of the Air, whose director, Theodore Granik, a brilliant attorney and writer, acted as moderator.

Of course, like other Members of the Congress, I have been familiar with the American Forum of the Air. In fact, in its earlier days I debated over its stations. But as I sat there last Sunday night I was suddenly impressed with the fact that only in America—only in a land which grants freedom of speech to its citizens—could such an institution as the American Forum of the Air be possible. In contrast, I thought of certain benighted countries in Europe where totalitarian governments have stifled the press, have done away with anything resembling freedom of speech, and have driven fear into the hearts of their citizens so that no one dares to say what he thinks.

I became curious about the origin of the American Forum of the Air, and I learned that it dates back to the hobby of one man—its director, Theodore Granik.

Back about 15 years ago a youngster just out of law school, who was serving as assistant director of a local New York radio station, conceived the idea of presenting a program under the title of "Law for the Layman." Outstanding civic leaders, judges, legislators, and attorneys discussed legal questions in simple terms that the layman could understand. Later, while a member of the bar in New York City and an assistant district attorney of New York, this young man continued this program over station WOR.

But people wanted both sides of the questions. Letters to the station stated that fact. The result was the founding of the WOR forum hour by Mr. Granik, presenting men and women in debates on vital questions of the day. It was the first program of its kind and was heard over station WOR until 1937, when that station became the key station of the Mutual network in the East.

By that time Mr. Granik had come to Washington to practice law; but his interest in his hobby as a contribution to mass education continued. He revived the idea of a forum program, this time over the Mutual network. During 1937–38 the program was presented as a half-hour feature and soon was attracting the attention of leading national personages, particularly the Members of the House and Senate. Fan mail became so insistent on a longer program that about a year ago Mr. Granik formed the American Forum of the Air.

With this opportunity to indulge in his hobby—mass education—Mr. Granik gave more and more thought to this program. Hobby, indeed, it is, as the program is a sustaining educational feature for which Granik gets no compensation. He considers it his humble contribution to education and to the cause of free speech in its fight against totalitarian muzzling by presenting the pros and cons of controversial timely topics of the day. Many of the topics are suggested in the thousands of letters he receives from listeners throughout the country.

It was not enough to secure as a speaker just a Senator, a Member of the House of Representatives, or a Cabinet officer. It must be the Senator, the Member of the House, or the Cabinet officer who was most vitally interested in the subject to be discussed. The extra half-hour has made it possible to add additional speakers in the form of a panel, and to have impromptu discussions following the presentation of the first two debaters.

In response to many requests from listeners who have been anxious to see their legislators and public officials in action and to ask them a question or two, it was suggested to Granik that he present these programs in an auditorium in Washington to which people from all parts of the country who might be visiting Washington could come to witness the broadcasts free of charge. The program being in the noncommercial class, there were no funds to pay for an auditorium or meeting place; but undaunted, and believing that as the topics discussed affected government and people, and as the speakers were usually officials of the Government, the public should use one of its own buildings for this purpose, Granik and officials of the Mutual Broadcasting System persuaded Secretary Ickes to allow the use of one of the Government auditoriums. Secretary Ickes agreed to allow the use of the facilities of the radio studios in one of the Interior buildings so as to permit an audience to attend, provided the Interior Department would have no part or connection with the program whatsoever, and provided it was clear that the Interior Department was merely permitting the use of its auditorium to seat an audience. It was also provided there was not to be an item of expense to the Interior Department, and, above all, that both sides should be presented at all times.

It is interesting to note that while Secretary Ickes has appeared on other forum programs he has refrained from appearing on this program, as he has always wanted it clearly understood that in no way was he or the Government in anyway connected with the program.

Granik checks with leaders of both parties in the Senate and the House on each program before he books it. If a Democratic Senator suggests a program, Granik immediately checks with an outstanding Republican leader to inquire whom they want for their lead speaker in opposition, and their panel. Similarly, Republican leaders of both Senate and House suggest programs from time to time, and Granik checks with the Democratic leaders to have them suggest their side.

To maintain a complete, fair presentation and balance, for which Granik has been commended and praised by leaders of both parties, he regularly asks the opposing speakers to send him their suggestions for remarks they might like to have him include in his introductions, and when Granik prepares his introductory remarks he measures what he says about the proponents and opponents line by line, giving the same number of quotations, the same number of phrases pro and con, and so forth.

Despite competition of other popular programs, the fan mail continued to increase. Friends suggested that a similar feature for newspapers be developed and Mr. Granik went wholeheartedly into this field. This newspaper feature, distributed to a large number of papers by United Feature Syndicate and published in Washington in the Washington Daily News, offers to national leaders the same opportunity in the press that the American Forum of the Air gives them over the radio. The articles are of a controversial nature, and both sides are presented by outstanding men and women who are authorities on the subjects discussed.

In addition, the newspaper features carry a box inviting the opinions of the public in general on the subjects discussed. Several thousand letters were received as a result of the first article in the series, and an equally large number on the second article. These letters give a comprehensive cross-section vote on questions of the day, and eventually will furnish a method of getting a real cross section of American opinion on any vital question of the day.

As on the air series, Cabinet officers, Congressmen, and other officials are given an opportunity to present their own unedited, unexpurgated opinions on the subjects under discussion.

I desire to say on the floor of the United States Senate that Theodore Granik deserves a vote of thanks from America for making possible the means of free speech, free expression of opinion, over the air and in the press, on the most vital topics of the day—a condition that could obtain nowhere but in America.

I ask unanimous consent that the record of the debate to which I have referred be published in the RECORD at this juncture in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The debate is as follows:

Announcer MCCORMICK. This is the American Forum of the Air.

Listeners from coast to coast are invited to hear the American Forum of the Air.

The facilities of these studios have been extended by the Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, in the interest of promoting educational radio programs temperately discussed by leaders of various schools of thought.

Information as to how you may receive a copy of tonight's proceedings will be given at the conclusion of the broadcast. Tonight the American Forum of the Air will be presented in two parts.

Under the direction of the chairman, Theodore Granik, pioneer in educational radio discussion and newspaper columnist, you first will hear the formal presentation of an opinion expressed by the four invited speakers.

This portion will be followed by extemporaneous discussion by the same speakers.

And now your chairman, Mr. Granik.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Mr. McCormick.

Latest developments of the second world war in Europe have focused our attention on the insular possessions of the warring powers—their colonial holdings—especially those adjacent to or vitally affecting the United States.

Purchase or acquisition in lieu of war debts of British-owned Bermuda and British West Indies have been debated on the floors of the Congress and on the front pages of the daily press. The proximity of Greenland and Iceland to the United States has likewise been a subject of much discussion and the question of application of the Monroe Doctrine has come into the limelight.

And stories of the possibilities of Japan eyeing the Dutch East Indies, with a view to possible acquisition should the Netherlands become involved in the European struggle, again have aroused American public opinion in view of the vast resources of these islands, many of which are vital to this country.

The German occupation of Denmark has already brought to the forefront the problem of sovereignty over Greenland, a vast Arctic bloc only about 1,250 miles from northernmost Maine and well within the Monroe Doctrine's continental sphere. What of Greenland, Americans ponder, with its nearness to the United States and the possibility of its development by a European nation as a naval and air base which might threaten the security of the United States? And what of the Netherlands, whose possessions lie within 1,500 miles of the Panama Canal?

In a speech addressed to the United States and its sister republics in the Western Hemisphere, President Roosevelt declared, "In this association of nations whoever touches any one of us touches all," a speech which might be taken as a warning to aggressor nations against seeking a foothold in western sections.

As new phases of the European war are constantly developing, Americans anxiously ask many questions as to our policy toward these possessions of foreign countries.

What will happen to the British possessions, Bermuda and the British West Indies, if Germany should win? How would it affect the United States?

What is our policy toward the acquisition of Dutch colonial possessions, with their vast stores of rubber and tin, on which the United States must depend for its supplies of these necessities?

We are already pledged to protect Canada againt invasion, but what about Greenland, Iceland, and other foreign possessions, all within striking distance of this country?

The American Forum of the Air has invited four distinguished Members of the Senate, all authorities on the subject, to present their views tonight.

We shall hear first from Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS, of Utah, member of the Foreign Relations Committee. He will be followed by Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN, of Minnesota, member of the Military Affairs Committee and national chairman of the "Make Europe Pay War Debts Committee." We shall then hear from Senator LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH, of the State of Washington, and Senator ROBERT R. REYNOLDS, of North Carolina, both members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Immediately following their short presentations of the subject they will engage in an informal panel discussion.

We invite your letters and comments on tonight's presentation.

And now our opening speaker, Senator THOMAS.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR ELBERT D. THOMAS

America finds herself faced with grave problems as nations in Europe with dependencies in the Western Hemisphere and dependencies near our outlying territorial interests in the Eastern Hemisphere enter into war. In the North Pacific we are neighbors to Canada, Japan, and Russia; in the South Pacific to members of the British Commonwealth of Nations; around the Philippines to China, France, Japan, Holland, Portugal, and the British Commonwealth. In Africa little Liberia has remained untouched and unharmed for generations because of our long-recognized friendly interest. Throughout the Americas we pride ourselves on being a good neighbor among our sister republics. The Monroe Doctrine is now a hundred years old. It has never been a static doctrine, but it has represented principles with a single prevailing thought, which is that the Western Hemisphere shall never be longer considered a place for European or Asiatic exploitation or forced control. Up until a few years ago the doctrine—whether it be thought of as a principle of self-defense for our own country, whether it be thought of as a principle looking toward a functioning unity for western nations, or whether it be thought of as a regional understanding which the world had learned to respect—was a principle primarily of our own making. Yet its basic idea rested upon the first and foremost principle of international law, which is respect for the independence and territorial integrity of all nations, regardless of their size or power.

In the last few years, due to the extension of the theory of the good neighbor and due to the agreements among the American states, the principles underlying the Monroe Doctrine have been accepted by practically the entire Western Hemisphere. To put it in another way: The Monroe Doctrine has been extended from a unilateral understanding to a multilateral one, and the spirit of cooperative endeavor in maintaining the doctrine and keeping from our shores those who would violate it has now become a task for unified action rather than merely the action of a single state.

Thus, when we talk about the change of status of any territory within the Western Hemisphere such change is not merely a matter of our own concern, it is a matter of concern to all of our neighbors; it is a matter surely of concern to the people of the territory affected, because if the doctrine of nonexploitation and noninterference is good for one it is good for all. Canada has never seen fit to join the Pan American Union or to become a party to pan-American agreements, but Canada has never resisted the theory of the Monroe Doctrine. It is useless, therefore, for us tonight to attempt to talk about what we should do in case of certain eventualities. If a real emergency were to come making it necessary to act first and talk afterward, as might occur, if the Panama Canal, for example, were in danger or if a neighbor were invaded, or if an expeditionary force were sent against one of our neighbors in such a way as to definitely expose us to attack, America should not be backward in acting. For America's whole military and naval theory is based upon the theory of defense and not of offense, so that any action outside this sphere of defense could not be contemplated without doing violence to theories and to understandings which have become fundamental. So well have some of these understandings become recognized that the United States no longer deems it necessary to arm against certain possible eventualities, and miles and miles of our boundaries are unprotected primarily because we cannot conceive of the trust and faith behind the understandings of nonaggression, which have grown up in the last 100 years, ever being violated. How, then, can we be definite about unheard of, unexpected eventualities? Personally, I believe that the mere spirit of cooperative endeavor and the existence of this understanding almost universally throughout the Western Hemisphere is probably our greatest protective force. It, too, is responsible for our naval and military policies. But that we do not put faith entirely in this understanding is proved by the size of our Navy and the preparations made by our Army. But both the size of our Navy and the readiness of our Army are known by the whole world to be in no sense threats but merely sustainers of peaceful processes on a defensive basis.

But that does not leave us without responsibilities. Allow an upsetting of accepted standards of thought and action to enter into these spheres of peaceful and friendly intercourse and the present-day sense of security from molestation from without is ended. No new problems seem ours today but tomorrow may bring many. I will cite a few. You will see that they come right home to you. It is not an exaggeration to say that America lives on rubber and out of tin cans. But we produce no rubber and no tin. Unfriendly interference with our tin and rubber trade lanes would upset our industry, transportation, and our food supplies. Tea and coffee drinking are well nigh universal habits. The trade lanes bringing tea and coffee are far and wide. Let these lanes become closed and American breakfasts are not as usual. I might go on but my task tonight is to lay a foundation for a thoughtful hour of discussion. I have said enough, I hope to drive, at least for 1 hour, two types of the commonest of our slogan mongers from our midsts. First, that America is self-contained and that if she minds her own business and sees that that business remains right here at home everything will be lovely, and second, that if Government left everything to business we would have a happy home world. It is hardly fair to be so simple but slogan mongers are always simple. They know how to fix things. They are like all gamblers—they know it's merely a matter of having the right combination. So let us leave them to it by withdrawing all Government interest in tea, coffee, rubber, and tin and see what happens. Then after we have settled our international policies by not being interested in trade lanes and trade routes let us settle our internal industrial and unemployment troubles by building our internal policies by formula, a formula older even than certain sloganized oft-quoted sentences from Washington's Farewell Address, and, thus solve our health problems, our wealth problems, and our educational problems by a simple proverb:

Early to bed and early to rise
Makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise!

Some men tell us our world and domestic problems may be solved with that simplicity. I wish to heaven that were the case.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator THOMAS. And now as our second speaker in tonight's forum, we present Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN, of Minnesota.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR ERNEST LUNDEEN

Developments in Europe have made the Americas conscious of the necessity of pan-American defense—defense which would remove the danger of foreign possessions and foreign governments now established within our natural defense lines. The United States has suddenly begun to consider what is and has been its policy toward insular possessions of foreign countries within the Western Hemisphere. The West Indies, Greenland, the Monroe Doctrine now are subjects of daily conversation by the American people.

Andrew Jackson demanded the seizure of the West Indies more than a century ago. He successfully collected from France a debt which France had refused to pay for a quarter of a century. Andrew Jackson said in his annual message to Congress, 1834:

"It is a well-settled principle of the international code that where one nation owes another a liquidated debt which it refuses or neglects to pay, the aggrieved party may seize on the property belonging to the other, its citizens or subjects, sufficient to pay the debt, without giving just cause for war. This remedy has been repeatedly resorted to, and recently by France herself toward Portugal, under circumstances less questionable."

Europe owes us fourteen and one-half billion dollars. Military authorities agree that the Caribbean Islands would form our Maginot Line, making the Canal Zone invulnerable and adding absolute protection to our entire coast line—east and west. It would make the Caribbean a protected inland American sea closed to the Old World and open only to the American Hemisphere. In the interest and welfare of the American people who are at present paying 4½-percent interest on the old war loans to Europe, our Government should begin negotiations for the acquisition of these islands in the Caribbean as part payment of the war debts. That action is absolutely in line with the principles established by the great American, Andrew Jackson. It would save us billions of dollars in defense.

Andrew Jackson does not stand alone as the only man who has advocated seizure of the West Indies. Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, Sr., stated in an article entitled "Our Blundering Foreign Policy," which appeared in Forum, March 1895: "England has studded the West Indies with strong places which are a standing menace to our Atlantic seaboard. We should have among those islands at least one strong naval station * * *."

Captain Mahan, greatest United States authority in naval strategy emphasized the vulnerability of our Caribbean interests with foreign countries established in that area. And today Maj. George Fielding Eliot, author of the Ramparts We Watch, admits that "it would be of great advantage to us if we could have a base at the southern end of the chain of islands, a base such as Trinidad or Barbados," British possession in America.

It was February 20, 1923, when Senator James A. Reed, the brilliant orator from the great State of Missouri addressed the Senate on a resolution proposing to take over the British and French West Indies. He said: "There is no strategic reason why Great Britain should insist on holding these islands against us, her friend and brother. They are not necessary for her defense against other countries. If we are to indulge the hope of eternal peace with Great Britain, then they are of no use for attack against us, because we are not to be attacked. They are contiguous to our coast and would be of great value to America in case of any contest with any other foreign power other than herself. Their possession by America would render the canal secure and enable us to keep it open against any nation in the world."

The able and distinguished Senator from Missouri said that Great Britain could maintain these fortified island bases with only one purpose in mind; there could be no other purpose. He maintained then that they should be our military bases, and in this he is sustained by all military and naval authorities.

These men are distinguished by their eminent service to the United States. They restate our foreign policy laid down by Washington, Jefferson, and Jackson regarding insular possessions in our American Hemisphere.

Recent European developments have brought the attention of the American public to Greenland, an island which the President, as well as geography, admits is within the Western Hemisphere.

On April 19, 1939, I offered upon the floor of the United States Senate a resolution authorizing the purchase of Greenland from Denmark. I drew attention to the fact that Greenland was within the American Hemisphere and was one of our strategic points of defense. Further I stated at that time, and I repeat now, that if we can appropriate billions for naval expansion we can well ask for a few million dollars with which to acquire by negotiation and purchase some of these islands lying near our coast and vital to American defense.

Pan-American Airways has been exploring the territory of Greenland for years. Colonel Lindbergh has pointed out the strategic advantages of this truly American land, and the Soviet Government last April 1939 sent two fliers from Moscow to New York by way of Greenland.

Now we are waking up to the facts. We have been in the habit of looking upon this strategic, valuable island as somewhat of an impossible place of no earthly use to anyone. Recent delving into available information regarding Greenland has started the United States thinking of an American Hemisphere for the Americas which will eventually include all islands lying within our hemisphere and now in foreign hands.

The posession of American land by foreign countries is a violation of the spirit of the Monroe Doctrine. We must pursue a foreign policy which will separate America from the quarrels and boundary disputes of Europe.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator LUNDEEN. And now we are pleased to present Senator LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH, of the State of Washington, who will discuss America's foreign policy in its more general phases. Senator SCHWELLENBACH:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

First, let me state the points on which I think I agree with my friends Senator REYNOLDS and Senator LUNDEEN.

1. When they urge that the United States must not become involved in any foreign war, I agree 100 percent.

2. When they say that our former allies committed a stupid blunder in repudiating their war debt to us, I agree 100 percent.

3. If they urge that by honorable negotiation we should try to secure partial payment of these debts by obtaining from England and France necessary strategic possessions in this continent, I agree 100 percent.

At this point I think I must part company with my two good friends. I think that what I advocate will be much more likely to result in a lasting peace for our people than the course they propose.

Let me put it in this way: We all remember what England's Prime Minister Chamberlain said when he returned from Munich. These were his words: "We have preserved peace in our time." His phrase "in our time" turned out to be just about 11 months.

I will not be content with a "peace in our time" for the United States. I know that each of us in Government is responsible to the mothers and fathers of the young men of military age to see that their boys are not dragged off into war. But I am not content to assure that group of parents alone. I think we in Government have an equally serious responsibility to the parents of boys 10 to 15 years of age. I even venture to think of the mother and father listening to this program who may before this night is over tiptoe in for a good-night glance at an infant boy in his crib. I think, Senators, that you and I have a responsibility to try to so conduct our Government that even they need not fear that that child will become the fodder for cannon when he comes to military age.

We will have no great task in attaining a Chamberlain's peace in our time. We can stay out of this war for the next 11 months, or even the next few years, without much difficulty. We can do that by simply refusing to see or hear what is going on in the world around us. We can rely upon the protection of our two oceans. We can trust to the fact that the other nations are too busy in their own wars to bother with us. It will take no great statesmanship to preserve that sort of a peace "in our time." But I am not content with that. America is entitled to peace during this whole next generation. Those of us in Government owe it to our people to strive to maintain it.

We hear so much today of the lesson we should learn from what happened between 1914 and 1917. I fully agree that that lesson should not be forgotten. The mistakes we made then must not be repeated.

What we must not forget, however, is that avoiding these mistakes will not suffice. By avoiding these mistakes we can preserve a Chamberlain peace "in our time." The avoiding of these mistakes we owe to the parents of the boys who are now of military age. If you agree that we also owe a responsibility to the parents of the younger boys, then you must agree that we must go further than avoid the 1914 to 1917 mistakes.

That responsibility requires that we avoid the mistakes made since November 11, 1918. People often wonder why the peace which followed the last World War was of such short duration. Statesmanship requires an analysis of the reasons behind the short tenure of that peace.

First, it must be conceded that the bases of that peace were unfair. The bases of that peace were punitive. You can't long maintain a peace that has as its purpose either the punishment or intimidation of a great race of people. That's why it is so important that our Government keep the record straight. That's why it is essential that our Government should protest every effort by any government to impose its will through either force or fear upon a weaker government. That is why it is important that we should preserve our economic stability in order that our voice might be heard when the belligerent nations sit around a peace conference at the termination of the present hostilities. If our peace is to last, the peace to which the belligerents agree must have as its basis the principle of fundamental fairness.

The second mistake that the nations made was the abandonment by most of them of the principles of simple, common honesty. The best standard by which to judge the honesty of nations as well as men is whether they keep their word. Broken promises, broken pledges, broken treaties have contributed more to the present world disaster than has any other single factor. These breaches of faith have not been limited to any single nation or group of nations. Treaty breaking, promise breaking, and word breaking have been the rule instead of the exception. International morality reached the lowest point since the seventeenth century. The present war is the natural and logical consequence.

Our people hope when the present wars end to play some part in establishing a lasting peace. To my mind that hope will be barren unless we can enter into such a peace conference with a record clear of the taint of treaty breaking on our own part. The only leadership we want to give the world is moral leadership. We must have our own hands clean if we try it.

That is why I am so insistent that we should discontinue our present policy of violating our obligations under the Nine Power Pact by supplying war materials used by Japan to destroy the administrative and territorial integrity of China.

The third mistake has been the failure of peace-loving nations to prepare to protect themselves against the aggressions of nations which they should have known were bent upon a policy of aggression. Not only China, Ethiopia, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Finland, and Norway have been the victims of their own unpreparedness. Even England and France today are suffering from that mistake. That is why I insist that we shall not permit ourselves to be similarly victimized.

It must not be forgotten that our responsibility for defense is not limited to the 48 States in the continental United States. Almost 120 years ago we assumed the responsibility of defense of the entire Western Hemisphere. That policy of over a century cannot be and will not be abandoned by our people.

America's international policy today must have as its foundation the recognition of these three policies:

First, the maintenance of fairness in our dealing with the other nations of the world.

Second, the eternal insistence that we at least will respect our international promises and obligations.

Third, that we will be so vigilant in our degree of preparedness as will allow us to protect ourselves from attacks from any source.

No one can lay down a guaranteed formula for lasting peace. The best that may be asked of anyone is that he does not repeat the mistakes which should be already evident to him. Certainly it should be apparent that we cannot ignore the world around us. While we may not like what is going on in the rest of the world, the fact is that we live in it. We could commit no greater blunder than to ignore it. There is nothing shorter lived than a fool's paradise. It will take more than a cool head to keep us at peace. We must keep our head up and alert to maintain a lasting peace for our people. May I conclude by repeating that when I speak of peace I mean peace even for that little boy child who is lying in his crib. Even he is relying on us.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator SCHWELLENBACH. And as our concluding speaker in the first half of tonight's forum we now present Senator ROBERT R. REYNOLDS, of North Carolina.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

The acquisition of island possessions in the immediate neighborhood of the northern portion of the Western Hemisphere, in which we are interested, really interests itself in the subject of providing for ourselves a stronger national defense. I am interested in making acquisition of islands in the Atlantic and in the Pacific, either by purchase or lease, in order that we may thereby forge around us a steel band for our protection.

Let us weld an iron ring around us. Let us safeguard ourselves by establishment of outposts in the Atlantic, the Pacific, and elsewhere. If we are to be attacked, and if there must be fighting, let's provide ourselves with such outposts as will successfully beat the enemy or enemies from our shores, thus prohibiting fighting within the confines of continental United States.

Firstly, as to the Panama Canal. It must be protected in order to provide uninterrupted ship negotiation from the Pacific to the Atlantic, or vice versa. This is extremely important. The Panama Canal is the key which makes possible the United States' unique two-ocean fleet. At Puerto Rico we are spending millions to strengthen our position in the Caribbean likewise with a view particularly to defending the Canal, which lies to the west. It is important to remember that while Puerto Rico is not particularly valuable economically, it is important to every American that the United States—and not another country—own it, and that no foreign ships and shells be there. Those defenses at Puerto Rico should be further strengthened to the north and to the south by making acquisition of British and French islands in the Caribbean extending from Port of Spain in Trinidad, just off the coast of Venezuela in South America, northward to and including Bermuda, which latter would provide us with our first and only outpost in the North Atlantic.

In the far North Atlantic we should acquire from the French St. Pierre and Miquelon Islands, just off the coast of Newfoundland. There we could construct valuable air, and, if necessary, naval bases, from which points we would be in a position to meet any attack from Iceland, Greenland, or the northeast.

With a view to welding strongly this band of steel in the Atlantic I have but recently introduced a resolution in the Senate of the United States which authorizes the President to enter into negotiations with Great Britain and France for the acquisition of these several island possessions to be credited upon their indebtedness to us, which approximates $10,000,000,000.

Now, to the west, in the matter of outposts in the Pacific for the purpose of protecting the western entrance to the Panama Canal, I suggest the leasing of islands of the Republic of Colombia, just south of the Equator, and the leasing or purchasing of Goose and Cocos Islands—owned by the Republic of Costa Rica. I also suggest that our Government endeavor to acquire Lower California by peaceful negotiations from our sister republic to the south so as to provide additional protection for the Panama Canal from the north. If this were done it would be impossible for any submarine or battle cruiser to find shelter in the waters lying between the mainland of Mexico and the Peninsula of Southern California.

Our fortifications in the Hawaiian Islands are splendidly located as protective outposts in that portion of the Pacific. At Honolulu we have one of the finest and strongest military establishments in the world.

Now, let's proceed northward to the Aleutian Islands. We purchased these a number of years ago from the Russians at the same time we acquired Alaska and other islands of that far-away northern country, for a consideration of $7,200,000. At Unalaska or Dutch Harbor, one of the Aleutian group, we have established a naval air base. These islands extend for more than 700 miles westward from Dutch Harbor in the direction of Japan and Russia. Attu, the westernmost of the Aleutian group, is only about 2 hours' flying time from Japanese territory, and even a shorter distance from Soviet Russia. A base should be established on Attu Island.

At the present time we are now engaged in the construction of a central air base at Fairbanks in Alaska. That is well. Further north at Nome we will eventually find it expedient to erect a military base in view of the fact that Siberia, part of Soviet Russia, is a distance of a mere few hours by boat from American territory. Fact is, the two Diomede Islands near Nome belong to the Russian and American Governments. They are only a mile apart.

North of the Diomedes in the Arctic Ocean lies Wrangell Island. It is about the size of Jamaica. It is located between the mainlands of Alaska and Siberia. As the crow flies it is virtually on a line from the metropolis of New York City to the capital city of the Philippines, the commonwealth of Manila. As a result of its geographical position it has great potential military value on account of the miraculous and phenomenal development of air power.

The first flag was planted on Wrangell Island by members of the American Jeannette expedition around 1880. It is now occupied by Soviet Eskimos and a few Russian soldiers. Its legal possession is in dispute. Recognizing its potential military value, some weeks ago I introduced a bill in the Senate of the United States requesting our State Department to ascertain the legal status of this island.

With the acquisition and development of outposts in the Atlantic and in the Pacific and in the far north where our territory is in the immediate proximity of both Japan and Russia, I believe that thereby we would be able to forge a steel band around our portion of the Western Hemisphere so strong that no enemy from foreign shores, regardless of strength, could successfully penetrate to the extent of waging war upon our shores.

With the development of air power, in which I have unlimited faith, and with these outposts which I have mentioned, there we would establish our first line of defense, and those lines of defense in the Atlantic and in the Pacific, south and north, east and west, would be carried many miles further into the two oceans by the utilization of aircraft. Air power has displaced already to a very large extent the Navy, battleship cruisers, or what not. For instance, it takes a battleship approximately 11 days to proceed from San Francisco through the Canal to New York. A battleship costs around $80,000,000. A fleet of battle planes, bombers, transporting tons of high explosives, can be purchased for an amount not in excess of the cost of one battleship. A fleet of fast-flying battleplanes, deadly in attack, can negotiate the distance from San Francisco to New York within a period of 11 hours. Make your own comparison. Ascertain for yourself by comparison the potential value of each—11 days as against 11 hours.

It is important for Americans to know that England has a naval base at Jamaica, France one at Martinique, the Netherlands one at Curacao. And it is further important for Americans to know that American territory is in the immediate proximity of Russia and Japan—because naval bases these days mean far more than slow battleships. They mean bombers—big and fast and deadly—let's forge that steel band around us and let's do it now.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator REYNOLDS. This concludes part 1 of tonight's Forum presentation.

And now as part 2 of tonight's American Forum of the Air, our speakers will engage in an informal panel discussion. Senator THOMAS will open the discussion.

Mr. THOMAS. Senator LUNDEEN closed his remarks with these two sentences: "The possession of American land by foreign countries is a violation of the spirit of the Monroe Doctrine. We must pursue a foreign policy which will separate America from the quarrels and boundary disputes of Europe."

The first sentence lays down a theory of the Monroe Doctrine which I have never heard until tonight. It is a theory that I cannot agree with, it is a theory that is completely out of harmony with the whole history of that Doctrine from its first enunciation.

For example, the American Monroe Doctrine was never aimed at foreign lands that held land in America. If it had been the American Monroe Doctrine would have attempted to drive England out of Canada, to drive France out of certain parts of the West Indies, it would have attempted to drive Holland, and England again, out of her parts of South America. That was not the idea. It was true that the Monroe Doctrine was against foreign exploitation and inroads of foreign power, and it was for sustaining countries in America that had rebelled against foreign oppression and had driven off the influence of foreign lands that were controlled and become independent. But to assume that the Monroe Doctrine is an aggressive doctrine causing us to go out and take land which does not belong to us in this hemisphere would upset entirely the whole peaceful scheme of the Doctrine and all that is behind our pan-American understanding.

Mr. LUNDEEN. In reply to the able Senator from Utah, I would like to say that we hear many new versions of old doctrines, especially under the New Deal. Perhaps we have heard some before. We heard one from Colonel Lindbergh not long ago. Does Canada have the right to involve herself in a European war and, if defeated, then ask us to fight her battles for her? Maybe that will bring some new construction of the Monroe Doctrine. And do nations in Europe have a right to default debts and then fail to provide us with bases whereby we can form that iron band of steel that the able Senator of North Carolina has just spoken of, fail to give us those bases? And certainly that involves new constructions of the Monroe Doctrine. There may be an evolution of the Monroe Doctrine that will change from time to time, although the main principles of the Monroe Doctrine, as I understand them, are these: That we are not to permit Europe to engage in any disturbance here within North and South America, neither are we to mix in their quarrels. It is a two-way proposition.

Of course, the subject is one for writings, and the able Senator from Utah made a long speech; he is a scholarly gentleman, and his statement was a learned one, I must say.

Mr. REYNOLDS. May I just add in reference to that proposition that here recently I have heard a lot of people saying that we ought to use the Monroe Doctrine for the purpose of taking over Greenland and Iceland and going 10,000 miles out of the way into the Orient to take charge of the Dutch East Indies that belong to the Netherlands, and a portion of which belong to the British.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I think that Senator REYNOLDS heard Senator LUNDEEN make the first part of that statement. I haven't heard anyone with much sense, in my opinion, make that part of that statement. They talk about the Four Power Agreement which involved the Dutch Indies, and say that we have some obligation in it. My position is that as long as we violated the Nine Power Agreement, which was written at approximately the same time and is of the same nature with reference to China as the Four Power Agreement is with reference to the Dutch East Indies, so long as we violate that affirmatively by furnishing the materials to Japan with which to destroy the territorial integrity of China, nobody should argue in this country that we should go over and protect the Dutch East Indies under the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I quite agree with you, Senator, and I do not think there is any obligation on our part whatever to go into the Orient at all and try to protect the French in Indo-China or the British in Borneo or the Dutch East Indies.

Of course, as the able Senator from Utah said a moment ago that we want to protect ourselves insofar as being able to get tin and rubber from the Dutch East Indies, that is true, but at the same time I do not think we should involve ourselves by going over there and trying to protect them.

I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, in answer to what my good friend, Lewis, has just stated here about our selling war materials to Japan. I think it is a crime for us to sell implements of death to any nation in the world for the purpose of making use thereof; and he is right, we ought not to sell implements of death to the Japanese for the purpose of slaughtering and murdering the Chinese, and at the same time we ought not sell implements of death to any nation across the broad waters of the Atlantic for the purpose of killing one another over there. If we are going to stop them from killing them in Asia by not sending the Japanese implements of death, we ought to stop them from killing them in Europe by not selling them war materials over there, and I voted against lifting the arms embargo.

Mr. LUNDEEN. May I ask the able Senator this brief question. You don't believe then in having favored nations over there that we should arm?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I believe we should have one policy for Asia and one policy for Europe. We should have the same policy for the whole world. We ought not say we are going to sell war materials to Europe and we won't sell them to Japan. We have to have one policy for the whole world.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. So far as Japan and China are concerned we do occupy a different position. In that case we have a definite agreement, the Nine Power Pact, under which we agree to respect the territorial and administrative integrity of China. Now when we furnish war materials to Japan, which we know they are using for the purpose of destroying the territorial and administrative integrity of China, we are not only doing what you object to, the selling of war materials, but we are also violating a provision of the same agreement into which we entered.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I quite agree there that it is a violation of the agreement, as the Senator just stated.

Mr. THOMAS. I would like to say a word about this band of steel that we are going to build up around us to protect. Probably the best way in the world to invite war on us is to put such a band of steel around us, and where are we going to put it if we start building and start putting our hopes in that kind of an idea to preserve peace?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I would say to the Senator that we are building that band of steel for the purpose of protecting ourselves against the attacks of any enemy or enemies from foreign shores.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. You have discussed the question of acquiring new territory for the purpose of protecting ourselves in what you call a band of steel, around all parts of our possessions. Is it very good for us to purchase and acquire new territories when we have a territory, Alaska, across from which, at a distance of about 200 miles, the Russians have in a short period of time constructed seven different naval and air bases? And we permit that territory to be absolutely defenseless and refuse even to appropriate some $12,000,000 to construct an air base at Anchorage.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I heard the Senator quarreling with that committee over that $12,500,000 which was to be utilized for naval bases, and I agreed with him then and I agree with him now, and I will say to the Senator that I think that we should certainly be giving much more attention particularly at this time to our defenses in the Alaskan Territory.

And by the way, may I mention in passing, that Russian territory is only one-half mile from our territory. The two Diomede Islands up there in the Arctic are just one-half mile apart. One of them, the Big Diomede, belongs to Russia and the Little Diomede belongs to the United States.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. You could almost jump from one to the other.

Mr. REYNOLDS. You could almost jump from one to the other. And just a hundred miles north is Wrangell Island, and the legal possession of that is under discussion at the present time.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I would say this, that I agree with the able Senator from Washington that we should fortify Alaska. We should fortify the Fairbanks base and all of those bases. My wife and I traveled through, we are familiar with it, and the fortifications are being neglected there.

Now, when the Senator of North Carolina speaks of the Big Diomede and the Little Diomede, I am not surprised that he says that America has the Little Diomede. We have been getting the little end of everything in the history of foreign affairs.

I would like to call attention to the letter of Mr. William G. McAdoo on March 18, 1940, on this question of debts. He loaned the money under the Wilson administration during the World War. What does he think about it?

Mr. REYNOLDS. When he loaned $25,000,000 for the purpose of buying the Virgin Islands, is that what you are speaking about?

Mr. LUNDEEN. No, I am speaking of the general larger subject.

March 18, 1940—if the Senator will permit:

"I have always favored acquiring the British West Indies and Bermuda in part payment of Great Britain's debt to the United States, and I have advocated it for more than 20 years. The first debt settlement was effected without any consideration of this important question by the United States representative of the Debt Commission. I doubt if this is an opportune time for reviving the subject, but I favor, nevertheless, acquisition of these islands and I am frank to say that I can see no good reason why the British Government should not be willing to transfer these possessions to us in part payment of their debt.

"The advent of the airplane and its continuing development make it more than ever important that the islands adjacent to our shores should be wholly under American sovereignty.

"Very truly,

"WILLIAM G. McADOO,

"Secretary of the Treasury During the World War."

I think we should consider his opinion.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Senator, McAdoo, you know, was instrumental in our making the purchase in 1916 of the Virgin Islands for $25,000,000 and they are one of the group of islands in the Caribbean.

Mr. THOMAS. I am merely interested in bringing home to all thoughtful persons the problems that you multiply immediately when you start attempting to put a steel ring or a steel band around Alaska. We have gotten along pretty well up in Alaska without putting a steel band there; we can fortify Dutch Harbor, we can fortify Wrangell Island, we can do those things, but they must be in conformity with the general defense for the Pacific and our defense out in the Pacific.

Now, say we take over Greenland; do we want to put an iron band around Greenland? Do we want to put an iron band around any new island that you acquire in the South Pacific or in the Gulf Stream or any place of that kind? It is utterly impossible. When you start a policy of defense you want to take into consideration your probable enemies, build your defenses where your enemies are going to come from. We do know how many nations there are in the world; we don't know how many nations there will be in the world tomorrow judging from the way things are going, but for us to accept a defensive policy or a Monroe Doctrine policy of acquiring all the land in the Western Hemisphere and then put an iron band around it, that wouldn't solve a single question for America. You must think in terms of what your reason is for arming.

Now, if, for instance, our sea lanes and things of that kind are interfered with, then it is time for us to think about defenses and to make our defenses accordingly. But if you put an iron band around America it means arming the boundary between the United States and Canada, for example. We have gotten along there pretty well for a hundred years without a single incident.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Not necessarily.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, if it isn't necessary, then let's get down to a foreign policy and Monroe Doctrine policy and a defense policy based upon some principle of common sense, not upon a principle of an iron band or a principle owning the whole territory within the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. REYNOLDS. As I stated at the outset in my preliminary statement, if we are attacked by an enemy or enemies I want that fighting to take place outside of Continental United States. I don't want any of the blood to be spilled upon American soil. I want the fighting to take place beyond the shores of the islands in the Caribbean, beyond the shores of St. Pierre and Miquelon Islands in the north, beyond the shores of the Hawaiian Islands. I want it to take place outside of the United States. Now there is just as much reason for our building defenses in the Atlantic and in the Pacific in a national-defense program as there is reason and sense for us to spend billions upon billions of dollars for a Navy. Why spend a billion dollars this year for a Navy? Are we expecting to attack somebody, are we expecting somebody to attack us? If, as suggested by the Senator, there is no danger of anybody ever attacking us, then let's quit spending these billions of dollars for the Navy and let's therefore begin to fight the enemy with the enemy, the enemy then being poverty and lack of education and misery and illness and sickness and unemployment and all that sort of thing. If the Senator doesn't think that we should build up our forces outside of the United States to keep the enemy out, why then let's take that money and spend it for the purpose of destroying the enemy within.

Mr. THOMAS. I do think that by all means. And the greatest defense the United States can have is a healthy, honest, earnest, well-trained citizenry, able to sustain itself and able to fight for what it knows is right. That is where we should begin.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am in entire agreement with that.

Mr. THOMAS. Never put faith in a steel band because you sometimes get captured from the rear, and then the steel band belongs to somebody else.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is the very idea; we don't want them to attack us from the rear, and therefore if we build a band of steel around the United States no enemy can possibly get in to attack us from the rear.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I think that possibly Senator REYNOLDS went a little further than he intended by using the words "steel band," and I think that possibly Senator THOMAS has gone further than he really thinks the Senator went in using the term "steel band." As I understood Senator REYNOLDS, it was his contention that there was a necessity for securing certain strategic positions and that those positions were necessary for the protection of the Panama Canal very largely, the proposals that he made. He swept to one side the necessity for taking over Greenland and Iceland, and I think the fact that he did that is in itself proof that he isn't an advocate of one steel ring entirely surrounding the country, but he simply wants certain strategic places to be secured, and I have no dispute with him so long as no effort is made to pull what might be called a squeeze play upon the present owners of those territories; I think we must conduct honorable negotiations in an honorable way. No matter what other nations may do our position should be, if we want to secure territory, to secure that territory in an honorable way by proper negotiation, and I don't think we should make any effort, as has been suggested here, to make use of an extension of the Monroe Doctrine as being a vindication of our right to seize or to intimidate other nations into giving us possession.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Let us not give out the idea to America that the United States is trying to gain all the territory in the Western Hemisphere, which I like to call the American Hemisphere. There are 21 nations here, I believe I am correct in that, and we are only one of them. True, we are the greatest and the strongest and all that, and have the greatest resources, but there are many other nations, and we do not intend to trespass upon their territory except by negotiation, if there should be some advantage in some small island near the canal where we can fortify and they cannot fortify, but our objective is to so protect all of America that we will be secure against the war madness of Europe, and let us not intrude ourselves into their quarrels, but let us do that which the able Senator from North Carolina said, turn to our domestic problems, our 12,000,000 unemployed, our hunger, poverty, destitution, malnutrition, illness, and ill-clothed and ill-fed people here. There is where our real danger lies; these people will not have the patience much longer to endure, and we will get rid of many of our undesirable elements the minute we have given these people jobs, and I want to say that I thoroughly agree with that.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Just one other word.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I agree with the Senator from Utah and the able Senator from Washington, and perhaps we can have an armistice, a peace, right here among ourselves.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Just one other word about that steel band. A lot of people are saying that Germany is going to win that war in 6 months and at the end of 6 months they are going to come over here and take the United States, including the little gem city of the mountains, that is my home town, Ashland, N. C. I know the Senator from Utah doesn't want Hitler and the Germans to come over here and take Utah and North Carolina and the other States of the Union, and to save his State and to save North Carolina I want to weld a band of steel around the United States so Hitler and the Germans and nobody can ever get in here and bother us.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. As long as we have declared an armistice, couldn't you conclude by telling how beautiful the State of Washington is?

Mr. REYNOLDS. It is a very lovely State. But I want to spank you for one thing and that is this: I do think it would be very unsportsmanlike for us to attempt to seize by force the British and French possessions in the Atlantic, and I have never suggested that. As a matter of fact I introduced two resolutions in the Senate of the United States, both of which authorized the President of the United States to enter into negotiations with the Republic of France and with Great Britain with a view to making acquisition of those islands, and the amount agreed upon to be credited to the $10,000,000,000 that France and Great Britain owe us now.

Mr. LUNDEEN. May I say there that I have never advocated the seizure of those islands unless negotiations failed. The seizure that I mentioned and have referred to for more than 20 years was quoting the words of Andrew Jackson against France when she owed us a debt, and he then advocated that policy, but when you talk of Seattle and the beauties of North Carolina, it is a poor fish that never saw the 10,000 lakes of Minnesota.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, gentlemen. You have been listening to an informal panel discussion on "America's Policy Toward Insular Possessions of Foreign Countries."

And now for a final word from Mr. McCormick.

Announcer MCCORMICK. Thus we conclude another broadcast in this season's series of "The American Forum of the Air."

This program emanates from the studios of the Department of the Interior in Washington, D. C., and is a presentation of WOL in cooperation with WOR.

These facilities have been extended by the Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, in order to promote educational broadcasts which present all sides of national problems.

In the interest of education, there are printed and distributed free of charge, the entire proceedings of these broadcasts. When requesting copies by mail, please enclose 5 cents to defray postage and mailing.

Address your requests to station WOL, Washington, D. C.

This series of programs is arranged by Theodore Granik, radio and newspaper commentator, who presided tonight as chairman.

They originate each Sunday evening through the facilities of WOL in the Nation's Capital.

Stephen McCormick speaking. This is the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that we discussed at the time of the debate to which I have referred the fortifications in Alaska and in that section of the hemisphere, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD at this juncture a very able article by the pen of Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, who writes in reference to that particular question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News]

ONE MAN'S OPINION

(By Hugh S. Johnson)

A glance at a map of the North Pacific will show that we are closer to Russia than any other good neighbor except Canada and Mexico. At Bering Strait, Siberia and Alaska almost touch. That is under the Arctic Circle and is not a dangerous menace. But far to the south of that our Aleutian Islands like stepping stones on the way to Kamchatka. The outlying Russian islands of Komandorski and Bering seem to be a mere extension of the Aleutian Archipelago and are within a few miles of the American Near Islands.

The Russians have naval and military air stations on these islands and no less than five such stations on nearby Kamchatka. Expert German naval personnel are reported to be present advising on the extension and strengthening of these bases and outposts. Submarines are being built or assembled on the Amur River behind Kamchatka and German technical missions are known to be at Vladivostok.

We are told that the Germans are there to advise the Russians in defensive works against Japan, but the activity at Komandorski—which sticks out like a sore thumb toward Alaska at Russia's most eastward point in the subarctic North Pacific—is not located against Japan.

We have no fortifications or air bases in the Aleutians, notwithstanding that they skirt the shortest or great-circle route between Seattle and either Japan or the Siberian coast, and that enemy air bases there could threaten the whole North Pacific and our main defensive line—Alaska, Hawaii, and Panama.

It is a threatening and dangerous situation. I know of no professional authority that does not agree that, purely for defensive purposes, we must guard this flank. The Army has authority for an auxiliary air base at Fairbanks, Alaska, but the proposed main operating air base is at Anchorage, at the head of Cook Inlet. This will require $14,000,000 to complete and urgently and immediately demands $4,000,000 to start.

The strategists of the House Appropriations Committee "economized" here while refusing to do so on billions of vote-getting hand-outs. They blacked-out Anchorage. They "economized" also on reserve airplanes for the Army—cutting the number asked for from 476 to 57. Part of this cut the War Department approved in view of increased foreign purchases of military types, but it did not do so as to 166 planes of a type the need for which was not lessened by expanded airplane-production capacity.

Finally, due to the increased tempo of the war and the fact that previous limited production plans do not promise enough equipment in rifles, guns, ammunition, and tanks for a very minimum American protective force in less than 2 years, the Army asked for $39,000,000 not included in the Budget—a Budget ruthlessly slashed by the Budget Bureau against military advice before it even got to Congress. That $39,000,000 bids fair to be denied.

* * * * * * *

In view of the present dangerous world conditions, this kind of careless or stupid trifling with national security may yet write these spendthrifts of political billions and cheeseparers of defensive necessities down as architects of national ruin.

In my opinion, the War Department itself has been bullied into presenting a wholly inadequate program in both speed and quantity. By that very token its timid requests may be taken as an irreducible minimum not to be whittled away by politicians under a claim of economy—when there is no economy elsewhere in their hearts.

The elimination of the Anchorage outpost is especially indefensible. We have by far the best General Staff we have ever had. Its recommendations are the result of years of study and more complete information on world military developments than any other department in Washington. In view of its showing and emphasis on the point, if I were a Congressman I would hate to have it on my soul that I had thrown it out.

Mr. REYNOLDS. In further view of the fact that at that time my colleague the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] made mention of the Dutch East Indies and the British East Indies, I ask that there now be published in the RECORD an article from some newspaper, the name of which I do not know—the dispatch seems to have come from Amsterdam under date of April 22—entitled "Jap Threat to Dutch East Indies Ridiculed."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

JAP THREAT TO DUTCH EAST INDIES RIDICULED—HIGH NETHERLANDS OFFICIAL WARNS AMERICA TO BEWARE OF ENGLAND'S ATTEMPT TO DRAW UNITED STATES INTO WAR VIA BACK-DOOR ROUTE

(By Frazier Hunt)

AMSTERDAM, April 22.—A high Government official has completely punctured for me the bubble of possible Japanese intervention in the Dutch East Indies.

"We are victims of our own busybody friends," he told me. "England would like nothing better than to drag America into war through the back door.

BITTERNESS SAID FANNED

"If the Allies are able to involve America in the Far East against Japan, it would remove from the Allies the responsibility for checking Japan in China and fighting her in the event she should decide to join up with Germany.

"Feeding America the idea that Japan is planning an invasion of the Dutch East Indies fans bitterness which might break out into flames."

With astonishing candor this important official also restated the Netherlands' determination to run her own affairs. He said:

"Even if we are invaded by Germany, and Britain and France were to become our Allies, we would not permit them to have anything to do with our islands.

PREPARING FOR SHOW-DOWN

"We would help them fight Germany, but we always make our own decisions on where and how. We would not permit the British to inject themselves into the East Indies."

This comment dovetails with the viewpoint the Dutch here hold regarding their homeland. They will permit no one to make the slightest intrusion upon their neutrality and independence.

"We have been preparing ourselves for some such show-down for a long time," the high official said, continuing:

"The world apparently underestimates our capacity for resistance at home or in the Far East.

"We have around 70,000 soldiers in the East Indies, most of them well-trained, disciplined natives with Dutch officers. But there are also a number of regiments of Dutch regulars.

"There is a modern coast defense at all important harbors with 3 cruisers, 24 submarines, a large number of destroyers, several excellent squadrons of Martin (American-made) bombers and more than 200 seaplanes.

"EMBARGO HELD UNITED STATES WEAPON

"An invasion would be a long-time, major operation. We would blow up the oil wells of Borneo and it would take Japan at least a year to reopen them even if she captured the islands.

"I insist that Holland isn't going to be bullied or thrown off balance. Everybody looks the same to us. We are determined to look after our own destiny."

Then he slyly added:

"Of course, if the situation regarding Japan should be dangerous—which we do not look for at present—then America by a total two-way embargo alone could bring tremendous pressure against Japan.

"We are not telling America her business. She is quite able to take care of herself, but she must understand how much the Allies would like to involve her in a Japanese war and thus into the European war by way of the back door."

CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY AND AIR SAFETY BOARD

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, some 2 weeks ago, and after Executive Order No. 4 on reorganization had been submitted to the special committee having charge of that matter, pursuant to a call to which I had to respond to leave the Senate for a few days I arranged with the chairman of the committee the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] that the matter would not be reported to the Senate until my return to the Senate.

Today I have conferred with the Senator from South Carolina, and we have an understanding, which I am sorry the Senator is not here to listen to but which I quote carefully, that some day early next week the special committee having charge of the resolution which I offered against Reorganization Plan IV will report it to the Senate.

The rule, as I recall it, is that after 10 days such a resolution may be called back to the Senate on discharge of the committee. With the arrangement and agreement I have had with the Senator from South Carolina I do not believe such a motion will be necessary, because, as I understand, he will call a meeting of his committee and have the matter reported to the whole Senate for consideration.

I make this statement so that the Senate may know that early next week I hope to secure Senate action with reference to Reorganization Plan IV and the resolution pertaining thereto.

Mr. President, on yesterday, according to the press, the President, anticipating a solid front of Republican opposition in the Congress to the proposed reorganization of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, summoned to the White House Democratic members of the House Committee on Reorganization, apparently for a discussion of prospects and strategy.

The implication in the President's action that the reorganization issue is to become a party issue, and the suggestion that the battle should be waged on party lines, are regrettable.

In the first place, the machinery set up by the Civil Aeronautics Act and the organization of the Authority provided in that act were adopted by a Congress of predominantly Democratic sentiment, and with the approval and encouragement of a Democratic President.

To a large degree, the need for an independent agency regulating civil aeronautics was first disclosed in evidence produced before a committee headed by a Democratic Senator who has since been elevated by the President to the Supreme Court. Judgment that a new order for the regulation and development of civil aeronautics was an imperative need was more than vindicated by the investigations and reports of another Senate committee headed by another member of the Democratic Party, and actively participated in by prominent members of the Democratic Party.

Both in the House and in the Senate, committee hearings and deliberations lasting for a period of 4 years, and dealing specifically with the bills which resulted in the Civil Aeronautics Act, were conducted under the leadership of able and distinguished members of the Democratic Party; and from beginning to end valued contributions to the writing of the law and to the preparation of the method of organization of the agency set up to administer the law were made by eminent members of the Democratic Party.

In fact, as those participating in the committee hearings are fully aware, representatives of six of the executive departments, and the President himself, vigorously supported the legislation proposed, and fully approved the creation of an independent agency, separate from the executive departments, to be charged with the regulation of civil aeronautics.

The Civil Aeronautics Act was not hastily passed, nor were the Authority and the Air Safety Board given only casual consideration. Deliberate study for many months and many years by members of both parties led to the Civil Aeronautics Act as it now stands. The Authority and the Air Safety Board were the products of the best thought which disinterested Members on both sides of the aisle so generously contributed.

The fight to preserve the creation of Congress, to guard the independence of the Authority, and to maintain the Air Safety Board is not a partisan fight. Democrats and Republicans together created the Authority and set up the Board with an eye alone upon the safety of passengers and pilots, the sound development of a science and an industry, and the strengthening of our national defense.

Mr. President, in connection with my remarks on this subject today I ask leave to have inserted in the body of the RECORD, immediately following my remarks, an editorial appearing in the Washington Daily News of Thursday, May 2, entitled "Lobby to Save Lives."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[The Washington Daily News, Thursday, May 2, 1940]

LOBBY TO SAVE LIVES

President Roosevelt's defense of his plan to reorganize Government control of civil aviation is unconvincing at best, and the President's case was not improved by his sarcastic references to the plan's opponents.
